HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed be the name of the Lord our God; with true hearts may we bend ourselves at the altar of prayer. To Thy will may we be true and live in fellowship with our fellow men. By our knowledge, or in our station, forbid, Heavenly Father, that we should become indifferent to their necessities. Do Thou encourage in this Chamber the sentiment of brotherhood; let it work freely and gladly in all directions, alleviating any imaginary or real difficulties. We pray, blessed Lord, forgiveness may take the place of retaliation, sacrifice in the place of indulgence, and union the place of rivalry. Help us to magnify Thy mercies in the spirit of gratitude. Harken, our Heavenly Father, when peace and contentment wrestle with worry and anxiety, strengthen us with the higher joys, which are heavenly and divine. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 27, 1934, were read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 8854. An act to amend the District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Act by amending sections 11, 22, 23, and 24.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2442. An act for the protection of the municipal water supply of the city of Salt Lake City, State of Utah;

S. 3170. An act to revise air-mail laws; and

S. 3404. An act authorizing loans from the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for the construction of certain municipal buildings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT BUILDING

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 8889) to provide for the custody and maintenance of the United States Supreme Court Building and the equipment and grounds thereof, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. LANHAM. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, this is a unanimous report from the gentleman's committee, and is a minor amendment providing for something that should be done?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; it was simply felt in the Senate that by section 4 of the bill certain minor matters of supervision were placed under the direction of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and that they would be unnecessarily burdensome to him. The Senate thought it unnecessary to impose such additional burden upon the Chief Justice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes after disposition of conference reports and other matters on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

THE TAX BILL

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL submitted a conference report on the bill (H.R. 7835) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1385).

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Washington inform the House when it is intended to take up the conference report on the tax bill?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Tomorrow morning.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, may I ask in this connection whether at this time the gentleman from Washington can give any indication as to whether or not he will allow an extension of time beyond the usual time for consideration of conference reports?

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I would not care to agree upon any extension of time at the present moment. I believe 1 hour is permitted under the rules, and I would not care to agree to any extension of time now.

Mr. SNELL. When the time comes, I am sure the gentleman will be a little more generous than he now indicates.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; and I thought he would be pleased to know that we hope to have additional time on this side to discuss the conference report.

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. I appreciate that.

CHICAGO WORLD'S FAIR CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (No. 1391), which was read and referred to the House Calendar:

House Resolution 360

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3235. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Library, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage, without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

EVA B. FRENCH

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H.Res. 341, Rept. No. 1387) from the Committee on Accounts and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 341

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Eva B. French, widow of Samuel H. French, late an employee of the House, an amount equal to 6 months' compensation, and an additional amount, not to exceed $250, to defray funeral expenses of the said Samuel H. French.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PETROLEUM INDUSTRY

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged report (Rept. No. 1388), which was read and referred to the House Calendar:

House Resolution 364

Resolved, That there is hereby created a select committee to be composed of 5 Members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker, 1 of whom he shall designate as chairman. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the manner in which the original appointment is made.

Sec. 2. The committee is authorized and directed to investigate the administration of the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry and such other person or persons as may have information pertaining thereto on practices obtaining in the petroleum industry as defined in such code, and on prices and production quotas effective since the approval of such code, with a view to ascertaining whether any such practice, price, or quota is unjust and inequitable to any interest involved; and if so, whether further legislation is necessary for the protection of such interest. The administrator of the code of fair competition for the petroleum industry is requested to cooperate with the committee in carrying out the purposes of this resolution.

Sec. 3. The committee shall report to the House during the present session of Congress the results of its (consultations and) investigations, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

Sec. 4. For the purpose of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present session of Congress in the District of Columbia as a whole or by subcommittee at such times, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, by subpoena or otherwise, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary.

The chairman of the committee or any subcommittee thereof may administer oaths to witnesses.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 2 or 3 minutes to propound some inquiries to the majority leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. May I ask what we are going to take up for consideration today?

Mr. BYRNS. I understand the rule making the Rayburn or stock-exchange bill in order will be called up.

Mr. RANKIN. It was my understanding the other day, and the understanding of a good many of us, that we were going to take up the Johnson bill first. This bill has been passed by the Senate. It has also been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and a rule was reported from the Rules Committee, I understand, before the rule on the stock-exchange bill was reported. There are a great many Members who are interested in this measure and from the flood of propaganda coming to the Congress from the Power Trust and other utilities against the measure, it looks as if the whole country is interested in it. These insidious interests are trying in every way they can to influence Members of Congress against this Johnson bill and in favor of the Lewis amendment. We are very anxious to have this bill considered—and when I say “we”, I mean a majority of the Members on this side of the House—and I want to ask the majority leader when we may expect to have the Johnson bill come to the floor of the House for consideration under the rule.

Mr. BYRNS. I may say to the gentleman that there will be such opportunity, of course. If the stock-exchange bill is taken up today, as I understand it will be, it will take several days to conclude its consideration, or, possibly, all the week. I have been informed that those who are in charge of the conference report on the revenue bill expect to call up that measure tomorrow. I do not anticipate it will take all day, but it will require, perhaps, several hours. I think then the decks will be clear so the bill referred to by the gentleman can be taken up. It was intended to take it up last week, but owing to circumstances with which the gentleman is familiar, it was impossible to do that, and, of course, it will have to await the consideration of the stock-exchange bill, which had been scheduled for today.

Mr. RANKIN. It was not necessary for it to be supplanted by this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield to me? I reported the rule on the Johnson bill. We figured that it would take 2 days to dispose of that bill. It gives 6 hours general debate. I consulted the leadership of the House at that time, and it was distinctly arranged that it would follow the stock-exchange bill. It being a Senate bill there is not so much need for haste as if it were a House bill.

Mr. RANKIN. May we have the assurance from the gentleman from New York in charge of the rule and also the assurance of the majority leader that it will be taken up immediately after the disposition of the stock-exchange bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am not an assurer; I take orders.

Mr. RANKIN. We have all the influences necessary to give us assurance—

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. COX. The gentleman will recall the circumstances under which this bill is to be taken up. This is a major proposition.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] that I am not complaining that the stock-exchange bill is to be taken up. I am for that measure. I think it is very necessary. But I want the Johnson bill taken up next, and I express the sentiment and attitude of a large percentage of the House. What I want is an assurance from the leadership. What I want is some assurance that the Johnson bill will be taken up immediately after the disposition of the stock-exchange bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to say to the gentleman that there is not the slightest disposition on the part of anyone, so far as I know, to delay the consideration of the Johnson bill. As a matter of fact, I had expected it would be taken up last week, but the gentleman is familiar with the circumstances that interfered with that. The stock-exchange bill was scheduled for today; and inasmuch as we did not take up the Johnson bill last week, it will have to wait the consideration of this particular bill. Personally, I have no objection to the Johnson bill following this, as far as that is concerned. There are a number of crime bills which the Department of Justice is pressing for consideration. I think it will take but a few hours to dispose of those, and the gentleman knows the urgent need for the passage of those bills at this time.

Mr. RANKIN. The need for the passage of those bills is not as urgent, in my opinion, as the immediate passage of the Johnson bill. I want it understood that I am not criticizing the majority leader.

Mr. BYRNS. I can assure the gentleman that the Johnson bill will be taken up—there is no question about that, but there is a question whether the crime bills should be first considered.

Mr. RANKIN. I should like to have the Johnson bill taken up before the consideration of the crime bills.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know whether the crime bills have been completed; we have not granted a rule from the Rules Committee.

Mr. BYRNS. I hope they will be taken up by general consent; I do not think there is any disposition to oppose them.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand; but the rule for the Johnson bill has already been reported. It was reported ahead of this rule that we are going to consider today. What we want is to have the Johnson bill taken up immediately after the disposition of the stock-exchange bill.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from New York [Mr. O'Connor], in charge of the Lewis-Johnson bill for the Rules Committee, has given the gentleman from Mississippi assurance that he will take it up at the first opportunity, which I understand to be very soon after the conclusion of the stock-exchange bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I shall not have any objection to that.

Mr. RANKIN. That is satisfactory. That will insure its passage this week.

LET PATRIOTISM CONTROL EXPAND MONEY CIRCULATION

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD by including an address that I delivered at Garfield Memorial Hall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRONG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address made by me at Garfield Memorial Hall, Washington, D.C., April 26, 1934:

I am greatly honored by the invitation extended me to address this assembly concerning policies of government. I am aware of the responsibilities resting upon those who are chosen to participate in the administration of our Government's affairs and accept your invitation with a deep feeling of duty.

The greatest possession allotted to mankind is life. To protect life and property and aid the people in right living, in order that peace and happiness may prevail, governments are formed. Our patriotic forefathers endowed us with the greatest Government on earth, and if there ever was a time, since the Declaration of Independence was written, which demands patriotic service in behalf of all the people in our Government's affairs, that hour has arrived.

The citizen who answers his country's call in time of war is a hero and a patriot. When our country entered the World War, practically the entire citizenship of the Nation rallied to the flag, while our boys were at the front in France and did its full duty. A great victory was the result. We are now desperately battling to overcome a great business depression, which has caused more suffering of the people throughout the United States than all the wars in the history of our Nation. Winning this war against this awful depression will bring prosperity and happiness to the people. This requires heroism and patriotism such as was exhibited by all during the World War. Not dying for our country, but living for it; not hard fighting, but hard thinking in order that our problems of government may be solved, not in the interest of a certain class, but in behalf of all the people.

Patriotism and heroism, which means loyalty and unselfishness, must be as outstanding in public officials who administer our Federal, State, and local governments, as that exhibited by the true soldier on the field of battle when his country is involved in war. The people are thoroughly equipped to win this battle against depression and can win such a complete victory that the enemy "depression" can never enter this country of ours again. The founders of our Government placed the ballot in the hands of the people and this is the weapon with which to win this battle.

In 1928 there were 72,000,000 voters in the United States and only about thirty-six millions of these participated in the Presidential election of that year. In other words, only one half the number of voters of the Nation wielded the weapon (the ballot) placed in our hands to win all battles over wrong in our Government's affairs. We cannot win victories for right in that way. The enemies of good Government all vote at each election, and when only one half of the voters of the country are aligned in battle it is easy for the enemy to win. Therefore, if we are to have a Government administered for the benefit of all the people, each voter must do his full duty in creating such conditions. This can certainly be accomplished by the sincere, intelligent use of the ballot.

If I fail to do my full duty in seeing that a government is maintained which will extend exact justice to all I should not complain if I suffer great injustice, for I am simply reaping that which I have sown. It is therefore a plain, open truth that we must do our full duty as citizens in order that peace, prosperity, and happiness may prevail, and life and property be protected. Let us remove all the splints and bandages and have a full-strength government rendering service to all the people.

As time advances there will be problems of government demanding our attention which must be honestly considered and properly solved, not in the interest of a few but for the benefit of all citizens. Let us bring our politics up to patriotism, our citizenship up to Christianity, and our ballot up to the Bible. If we will do this, all governmental problems will be settled right.

One of the great questions before the people for their adjustment today is the financial system of our Government. I am sure all citizens who have given the matter serious and unbiased study are satisfied the awful business depression, which has brought untold suffering to millions of our people, was brought about because of insufficient money in circulation. This can be easily adjusted, if we earnestly and intelligently determine to undertake the task.

In discussing finances, I am reminded of a statement made by a good friend who has given the question of finances special study for many years, and has much knowledge of all its phases. He says, many citizens believe the money problem is so intricate that only a few experts possess knowledge of same. He claims the circulation of money is as simple as the circulation of water through a water system and illustrates by saying: "A man is on the water main near a cut-off with a wrench in his hand. This man can easily regulate the quantity of water flowing through the entire system. He can give the exact amount required, or refuse to allow the necessary amount to circulate, or cut off the water supply entirely." This is a splendid illustration, and will rightfully appeal to anyone who will unselfishly consider this question. The Constitution of the United States plainly states that Congress shall issue money and regulate its value. Congress has not obeyed this plain mandate of the Constitution, but has permitted this important function of our Government to be controlled by a few malicious manipulators who have conducted the financial system in a manner that has brought ruin to the business interests of our country, and caused the depression which has prevailed the past few years, which has brought awful suffering to millions of our people.

Had someone announced a few years ago there would soon come a time when our country would be overflowing with food products and clothing material but there would be millions of people suffering in that period, because they could not procure necessary food and clothing, that person would have been pronounced insane. That condition has prevailed for several years, and is so contrary to the truth we could not have believed such could have possibly occurred had we not witnessed same with all its intense suffering. Congress is vested with power to bring relief by establishing a financial system which would forever prevent the return of business depressions.

When relief of the people is mentioned by expansion of the circulation of money, these malicious manipulators of our money system begin to yell, "Flat money", "Printing-press money", and spread their malicious propaganda all over the country, through the newspapers and otherwise. They know that money issued as the Constitution provides would be the best money on earth. But these manipulators want money to be scarce in order that the rate of interest will remain high, and leave them in absolute control. They are the same class of people our Lord scourged from the temple. They scorn the Ten Commandments and the Sermon on the Mount.

There should be no speculation in money; it should be plentiful at all times, and the rate of interest low. This would cause the prices of real estate, farm products, livestock, and all other commodities or property to advance in value. Wages and salaries would also be raised and prosperity in general would prevail. Someone has said if they could control the circulation of money in any country they could absolutely control the entire government of that country. We know this is true, and the great battle now on is to liberate our Government from the malicious dictatorship of the manipulators of our money system.

I believe all will agree that Mr. Edison was a very wise, practical man and a patriot who rendered great service to his country and gave much thought concerning the welfare of the people. Speaking about money he says: "I think we are getting a sound idea on the money question. The people have an instinct which tells them something is wrong, and the wrong somehow centers in money. Under the old way any time we wish to add to the national wealth we are compelled to add to the national debt." He refers to issuing bonds which draw interest and borrowing money on these bonds with which to make public improvements. He says: "If our Nation can issue a dollar bond it can issue a dollar bill. The same element which makes the bond good makes the bill good also. The difference between the bond and the bill is that the bond lets the money brokers collect twice the amount of the bond, whereas the currency draws no interest."

"If the Government issues bonds it simply induces the money brokers to draw money out of the legitimate channels of trade to buy the bonds; if the Government issues currency it provides itself with enough money to increase the national wealth without disturbing the business of the country, and in doing this it increases its income without adding a penny to its debt."

"It is absurd to say our country can issue bonds and cannot issue currency, but one fattens the usurer and the other helps the people. If the currency issued by the Government were no good, then the bonds issued would be no good either. It is a terrible situation when the Government, to increase its national wealth, must go into debt and submit to ruinous interest charges at the hands of men who control the fictitious value of gold."

"Let us look at it another way. If the Government issues bonds the brokers will sell them. The bonds will be negotiable; they will be considered as gilt-edged paper. Why? Because the Government is behind them. But who is behind the Government? The people. Therefore, it is the people who constitute the basis of Government credit. Why, then, cannot the people have the benefit of their own gilt-edged credit by receiving noninterest-bearing currency instead of the brokers receiving the benefit of the people's credit in interest-bearing bonds?"

"The people must pay anyway; why should they be compelled to pay twice, as the bond system compels them to pay? The people of the United States always accept their Government's currency. If the United States will adopt this policy of increasing its national wealth without contributing to the interest collector—for the whole national debt is made up on interest charges—then you will see an era of progress and prosperity in this country such as could never have come otherwise."

Mr. Edison says much more on the money question, but I have given the basic facts mainly of his statement, which show our Government has issued interest-bearing bonds instead of money, and the national debt today is about $28,000,000,000 and the people are paying interest on this vast sum at the rate of more than $1,000,000 per day.

After the War between the States, President Lincoln asked that the Constitution be obeyed in regard to issuing money. His request was granted, and Congress issued currency with which to pay the war debts of the Government. Three hundred and forty-six million dollars of that money has remained in circulation, and it is in circulation today. No better money exists on earth.

Because currency was issued with which to pay the war debt, instead of interest-bearing bonds, the people of the United States have been saved about $12,000,000,000. This causes us to consider what is commonly called the "soldier's bonus." When the World War ended a great number of our World War veterans were issued, by the Government, adjusted-compensation certificates for services rendered our country during this awful war. These certificates are payable in 1945 and amount to more than $2,000,000,000. To pay these certificates now would save the Government considerably more than $1,000,000,000, and under House bill No. 1 by Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, it would not cost the people one penny. This bill calls for issuing $2,215,000,000 in currency which can be based on the gold in the United States Treasury. I mention basing the currency on gold in order that there can possibly be no objection to the value of the money. This would pay the World War veterans a debt which is actually due them, for which they hold the obligations of our Government, and save the people more than $1,000,000,000 by paying it now, besides relieving thousands of our World War veterans from want and suffering. That is not all the benefits to be derived. It would place $2,215,000,000 in circulation, bring much-needed aid to the farmer, merchant, banker, manufacturer, and all other business enterprises.

There has passed the lower House of Congress at this time a bill authorizing payment of the service certificates which the Government owes the World War veterans. If this measure becomes law, it will place about $100,000,000 in Texas, and more than $5,000,000 in Dallas County, and will not cost the citizens of Texas or of Dallas County one cent, but will relieve the want and suffering of several thousand World War veterans besides being a great help financially to all the people. I am stating facts no one can deny, and it is really puzzling when any person opposes the World War veterans being paid what the Government owes them under the terms of House bill No. 1. Let us summarize the whole matter: It will bring relief to many thousands of World War veterans and their families. It will greatly relieve the awful business depression now prevailing. It will not cost the taxpayer one cent.

Not only do these malicious manipulators control the circulation of the money of our country but they control the credit also, and can contract both the circulation of money and the extension of credit. We have witnessed all this and have seen thousands of our farmers, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and all other classes of business absolutely ruined.

There are measures now pending in Congress either of which will correctly adjust our financial system, thereby bringing relief and prosperity to the people. Chief among such measures is one requiring the Government to issue money instead of issuing interest-bearing bonds. Another measure is to reestablish the coinage of silver which was used as money from the time our Government was founded up to 1873, at which time its coinage was abandoned without the consent of the American people. Eighty-four percent of the silver of the world is produced on this side of the Atlantic Ocean, and up to 1873 the silver dollar was at par with gold and would be so today only for the crime of its fraudulent demonetization. Those who have discussed the question of finances with our President say he favors the expansion of money circulation. Therefore, we should secure such legislation and relieve the country of this awful business depression without further delay.

The solution of the financial question in a legal, sensible way will bring prosperity to all classes of business, thereby relieving the suffering of millions of people. There are other issues needing the attention of Congress which I desire to fully discuss at a later date.

When President Roosevelt was inaugurated March 4, 1933, all business of every character was ruined, starvation was abroad in the land. Relief must come and come quickly; therefore, the President at once launched temporary measures to relieve the suffering in order that his administration may proceed to bring permanent relief to the entire Nation. No President has assumed a greater task than Franklin D. Roosevelt. He is actively and sincerely using all efforts possible to administer the affairs of Government in the interest of all the people, and needs the earnest support of all loyal citizens; for no man on this earth has more weighty problems, duties, and responsibilities making demands upon him than has our President.

I have not agreed at all times with our President, and I doubt if there is a Member of either branch of Congress who has fully agreed with him in all he has said and done; for that reason, I have supported him as loyally as any Member. He would have no respect for a man who did not try, at least, to think for himself; neither would the people respect such a man; and I could not properly respect myself did I not undertake to solve questions which demand my sincere and thoughtful attention. I believe our President is very sincere; and if he receives no more opposition than that coming from me, his policies will largely prevail.

FARM RELIEF

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the courtesy of the House in granting me permission to present a statement which relates to the splendid assistance which has been given by this administration to those who till the soil.

When it is taken into consideration that the source of practically all wealth comes from the ground, it must be conceded that unless our farmers can be maintained in a satisfactory manner other occupations will likewise suffer. Therefore, I am proud that I have had the opportunity to vote for all the recovery bills which have been sponsored by the Roosevelt administration, and the following statements made in a letter to a friend are self-explanatory:

DEAR FRIEND: I am sure that you will be interested in having me give you some information relative to matters of vital importance to every citizen in the Nation.

When the present administration took over the affairs of this Government, farms were being foreclosed, the price of farm commodities was the lowest for many years, our foreign trade was at a low ebb, and banking conditions were anything but good. If President Roosevelt had not been possessed with the kind of courage and bulldog tenacity to blaze new paths in the way of providing humanitarian legislation, anything might have happened. To say the least, our country was in the throes of an economic war, which might have resulted in more fatalities than the World War.

The President's program has caused our farmers to receive some $200,000,000, and it is estimated that before the end of 1934 the total amount furnished by the Government will exceed $1,000,000,000. Such payments will be as follows: To producers of corn and hogs, a little over $367,000,000; wheat growers, $148,000,000; tobacco growers, $35,000,000; cotton growers, $173,000,000; dairy farmers, $150,000,000; corn loans, $111,000,000; cotton loans, $110,000,000. In addition, $150,000,000 will be paid to the producers of dairy and beef cattle.

I have always taken the position that the war profiteers, big business, and those who have been able to enrich themselves because of monopolies, should be forced to pay the cost of restoring this country to normalcy and, as a member of the Ways and Means Committee, it was my privilege to help stop up the leaks that enabled Morgan, Mellon, Mills, Meyer, and the so-called "silk-stocking crowd" to escape taxation in the past and, through the provisions of the income-tax law, which includes inheritance taxes, they will be compelled to pay in the future. I am proud that President Roosevelt had sufficient courage to stand behind the kind of program which, I believe, will restore this country to normalcy.

We all realize that the bad situation that was brought to our people resulted from years of mismanagement and that it will take some time to right the wrongs of the past. Therefore, I hope I may have your continued cooperation in every matter that relates to the welfare of our Nation, as it is my earnest desire to render to you, and every person in the district, the best service possible.

OLD-AGE PENSION

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I desire to discuss with you for a short time the necessity of enacting before the close of this session an old-age pension law, to take care of the old people who have been so long neglected.

Twenty-eight States have up to this time passed a law to provide for old-age pensions, and other States would soon fall in line if this Congress would now pass a law to cooperate with the States in caring for them.

I introduced a bill in Congress of this kind. Many other bills of similar nature have been introduced, and from the various bills one of them should be passed. The committee has drafted a bill which would care for them, and I hope the committee will push the bill to its final passage at this session. I shall gladly support it.

Persons that are now over 65 years of age cannot get employment at public works or at anything where they can make a living. They are the real soldiers of our country that have fought long and hard to make a Government fit to live under. They have set up for us a high standard of morals and have aided in establishing the best Government in the world; and they should not be forgotten, but should be taken care of to the very best of our ability. The matter of caring for them has been delayed too long, so let us do it now before the close of this Congress.

Every other nation with the ability of ours has for many years had legislation of this kind, and we should not delay it longer.

Day by day they are being called to the eternal home, and I am sure that in their declining days it would be a real joy to them to know that the great Government they helped to build had shown its appreciation for their services in this way.

I ask each of you Members of Congress who are interested in an old-age pension law to join me in an earnest appeal for the consideration of this legislation at once.

OWNERSHIP OF TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I present a privileged report on House Resolution 291, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 291

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the following information: The names and addresses of all persons and corporations who own tax-exempt securities in the amount of $100,000 or over, the amount of such holdings held by each individual or corporation, kind of securities held in each case, and the interest paid on such securities per annum.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT NO. 1389

(Adverse report to accompany House Resolution 291)

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution (H.Res. 291) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to transmit to the House of Representatives certain information with respect to the ownership of tax-exempt securities, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House and recommend that the resolution do not pass.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I ask that the Clerk read a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
April 10, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have your letter, dated March 22, 1934, enclosing two copies of House Resolution 291 and a statement in support thereof by Representative FISH, who introduced the resolution. The resolution provides that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the names and addresses of all persons and corporations who own tax-exempt securities in the amount of $100,000 or over, the amount held by each individual or corporation, the kind of securities in each case, and the interest per annum paid thereon. A subcommittee, of which you are chairman, has the resolution under consideration and you desire a statement from the Treasury Department before making your report.

Section 22 (b) (4) of the Revenue Act of 1932, which excludes from gross income interest derived from securities described in the resolution, requires every person owning any such securities to submit with his income-tax return a statement showing the number and amount of such securities owned by him and the income received therefrom. A statement showing the total amount of tax-exempt securities held and the amount of income derived from such securities by all taxpayers having net incomes of $5,000 or more could very easily be furnished, since such information is compiled each year for statistical purposes, but the only manner in which such information could be obtained with reference to individual taxpayers would be by examination of each and every income-tax return filed for the period to be covered by the report.

For the taxable year 1931 the individual returns filed totaled 3,116,317, while the number of corporation returns was 493,293, and for 1932 the returns filed to August 31, 1933, were 3,760,402 individual returns and 481,368 corporation returns. The resolution does not show whether the information is desired for a particular taxable year or a period including several taxable years, but it is apparent from the figures given that the preparation of a statement containing the desired information would require a very considerable period of time and large additional expense. Many of the returns are located in the offices of the collector of internal revenue throughout the country, while others are in the hands of revenue agents, who are making audits of the books and records of the taxpayers. Others are in process of review in the offices of the Bureau of Internal Revenue here in Washington. Compilation of the information called for in the resolution would necessitate the employment of an additional clerical force and would greatly handicap the Bureau in its present efforts in collecting delinquent taxes.

Very truly yours,

H. MORGENTHAU, JR.,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. C. C. DICKINSON,
Chairman Subcommittee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that will he yield to a question? This is a serious matter.

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield purely for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Why is it that the Congress of the United States is not entitled to this information? I do not care what it costs, the time has come in the history of this country when the Membership of the House, at least, ought to know these facts.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not yield any further. I yielded simply for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of this resolution and against tabling it, and this Department ought to get this data for Congress, and I am in favor of getting the information. I cannot understand why this committee would take this action.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to lay the resolution on the table.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 87, noes 39.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Fourteen members have arisen, not a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are refused.

On motion of Mr. DICKINSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was laid on the table was laid on the table.

EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION OF PUBLIC HIGHWAYS

Mr. DRIVER, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution for printing under the rules, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 365 (Report No. 1390)

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 8781, a bill to increase employment by authorizing an appropriation to provide emergency construction of public highways and related projects, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Roads, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

REFERRING CLAIMS OF TURTLE MOUNTAIN BANDS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill S. 326, referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma calls up a conference report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 326) referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same.

WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,

DENNIS CHAVEZ,

HUBERT H. PEAVEY,

Managers on the part of the House.

HENRY F. ASHURST,

ELMER THOMAS,

LYNN J. FRAZIER,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (S. 326) referring the claims of the Turtle Mountain Band or Bands of Chippewa Indians of North Dakota to the Court of Claims for adjudication and settlement, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

The amendment adopted by the House and agreed to by the conferees eliminates a provision authorizing the payment, upon approval by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, of actual court costs from the funds of the Turtle Mountain Chippewa Indians on deposit in the Treasury of the United States. No such funds are so on deposit, and the provision eliminated would therefore be ineffective. Its elimination leaves open to the Indians the way to meet the court costs in whatever manner may be most feasible for them.

WILBURN CARTWRIGHT,

DENNIS CHAVEZ,

HUBERT H. PEAVEY,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I want to call the attention of the House to what it is doing in connection with bills of this character. It is too late to take any action on this report, but I rise to give some information as well as issue a warning we must be careful in the future.

In the past few years the Congress has passed 31 jurisdictional bills, involving $800,000,000. They confer jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to determine all legal and equitable claims of certain Indian tribes against the United States. On April 4 the House passed this bill and it now comes from the conferees. Another bill has just been reported by the House committee.

The original claimants, if they had a claim, are long since dead, and if claims are allowed descendants, generations removed from the original claimants will receive the benefits.

Of course, claims attorneys revive these claims, and they, too, will reap financial benefit if a favorable decision is rendered. Personally, I think this practice should stop. You stopped Civil War claims from going to the Court of Claims, and you can do so in claims of this kind.

It costs the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars for the Comptroller General to get up a defense for the Department of Justice to present in opposition in the Court of Claims.

I simply want to call the attention of the House to bills of this character, and I think we should pay more attention to them in the future than we have in the past.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. I am familiar with what the gentleman has just said, and I know it is true, but that situation will never be changed as long as all of the members on those various committees come from that part of the country that is vitally interested. If the membership on the committees was spread over the whole country, they would give some attention to the matter. That should be stopped, but it never will be stopped until we change the make-up of the committees.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not think we should admit that the House as a whole is going to be controlled by the action of committees on matters of this character. I agree with the gentleman, committees should be made up not solely of members who are interested in legislation that the committee considers.

Mr. SNELL. But it is controlled.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It might be. My vote is not controlled by the action of the committee nor is the vote of the gentleman from New York. I thank the gentleman for his statement coming as it does from the Republican leader but my real purpose in rising was to call the attention of the House to what we have been doing so that in the future more serious consideration will be given to such legislation. When such a sum as nearly a billion dollars is involved it is a very serious matter. No one can deny that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Well, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, because the gentleman has spoken to me, and I know something about what the gentleman intends to say. I do not know that I am favorable to it, but on the other hand I want it understood that I know it is a purely political speech, and if someone on this side should want to make one a little later, I hope there will be no objection from the gentleman's side of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas.

There was no objection.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, under date of April 21, an Associated Press article appeared in the local newspapers and was carried in practically all the newspapers of the Nation under the glaring headlines "House Democratic Shake-up Expected—Replacing of RAINY and BYRNS Foreseen After November Election." The article states:

Some administration men foresee a possible shake-up in the House Democratic leadership after the fall congressional elections.

The thought occurs to us, Who are the administration men who seek or see a shake-up in the Democratic leadership? It would be interesting to know what inspired such an unwarranted article.

The article continues:

The proposition has been laid before President Roosevelt several times during the present session by friends who have become disturbed over the sometimes rebellious attitude of the top-heavy Democratic majority in the House.

The assumption that the House is rebellious against the new deal or the policies and desires of the President or the administration does not bear the searchlight of investigation and the truth. During the administration there have been 22 test votes on policies and measures advocated by the administration; each and every one of these measures have been passed by overwhelming majorities. At no time has there ever been any rebellion, and the only exception to carrying out the wishes and desires of the Chief Executive is on the recent veterans' legislation. In that instance the Democratic House adopted what is known as a "gag rule" to the independent offices bill. When the measure reached the Senate it was amended to include the veterans' legislation. If the House was rebellious in this instance, the Senate was even in a worse attitude. No leadership nor any influence, even President Roosevelt himself, could have changed that vote. After all, there was very little difference between the views of the Congress and the President. The President is committed to the policy that no veteran should draw a pension by presumption, although the presumption of service connection has been recognized not only by this administration but for time immemorial.

THE BONUS BILL

Nothing could have stopped the passage of the bonus legislation, most of the Membership of the House being committed to this measure. It passed the Seventy-second Congress, when the present leadership was not in charge. In that same Congress, with a Democratic House and a Democratic leadership, at a time when the Ways and Means Committee and the leadership of the House were demanding the sales tax, after days and weeks of insistent demands, it was overwhelmingly defeated, receiving approximately only 40 Democratic votes.

During this time the Democratic House had as its leader a man honored and loved by each Member, one of the greatest men, most forceful leaders and statesmen ever to preside over this body, the Honorable John N. Garner, now Vice President of the United States. [Applause.]

When the controversial administration tariff bill was submitted to this session, out of a Democratic Membership of 313, only 11 Democrats voted against it, whereas in the Seventy-first Congress, with a Democratic Membership of 165, a larger number of Democrats voted for the Smoot-Hawley Tariff law.

Never in the history of congressional legislation has there been such a solidity of its membership to carry out the wishes and desires of its President. It is natural that where there is such an overwhelming majority, coming from every section of the country, constituting inexperienced Members who have more or less made personal commitments, that there would be a difference of opinion and the failure to unite on all administrative measures. Never in the history of any Congress has so much progressive, experimental, and remedial legislation been submitted to an American legislative body. Every Democratic Member on the floor of this House should resent the insinuation that a great portion of its Membership is in a rebellious attitude toward the administration or its leadership. It is not fair to the Membership, and it does not reflect the truth. This House needs no dictatorship in the form of leadership and will accept none, and any one, or any set of men, who would attempt to dictate, domineer, or bulldoze the Membership of this House and not permit them to vote their own honest convictions, would meet with ignominious defeat and failure.

The Membership of the House is fresh from the 435 districts and knows the sentiment of the Nation. Their constituency expects them to exercise good judgment and not be led. Often Members are accused of being rubber stamps and often we do sidetrack our own convictions for the organization and leadership purposes, but we resent being led by a halter, like a mule to water.

This Democratic House has stood and does now stand as a united solid phalanx in its defense of President Roosevelt, his policies, and this administration.

The article further states:

The Chief Executive has been told that the next Congress largely will determine the future of the Democratic Party. The growth of insurgency in the House Democratic ranks recently—the rejection or sidetracking of administration propositions—caused concern among the President's friends at both wings of the Capitol.

We wonder who is so concerned about the particular leadership of the House. No administration measures that I can recall, certainly none of any consequence, have been rejected or sidetracked.

The article has not only for its object and purpose holding up to ridicule and contempt the Membership of this House but its real motive is a challenge to the leadership of the Speaker and majority floor leader. It was prompted and published with a view of injuring these distinguished leaders who are always fair and courteous, who never miss an opportunity to extend a helping hand or to solve a problem, or to aid a Member in obtaining relief and carrying out the wishes of his constituency. Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, our distinguished Speaker, ripe in experience, a seasoned statesman, is the "Noblest Roman of them all." He is "A man in whom the elements are so mixed that Nature might stand up and say to all the world, 'This is a man.'" [Applause.]

Hon. JOE BYRNS, of Tennessee, our congenial and able majority leader, is a true southern gentleman. [Applause.] By his unassuming and unostentatious manners he has endeared himself to all with whom he comes in contact. With the stature, rugged honesty, statesmanship, and courage of an Andrew Jackson, reared and buried in his congressional district, he is a natural-born leader. [Applause.]

The article concludes:

President Roosevelt has indicated his regard for both Speaker RAINEY and Floor Leader BYRNS, and some administration adherents believe that one or both of them may be offered substantial appointive posts after the election.

We have no intention of swapping this team of wheel-horses; they work together and can always be depended upon to deliver the load in a given time at its destination. We would feel guilty of ingratitude to even entertain a swap, as well as fearing we might get a wind-broken, foundered, stringhalted, or balky team. These gentlemen will not apply for, be tendered, or accept any positions at the hands of this administration other than those which they now so well honor and fill. For over 30 years, on the floor of this House and from one end of this Nation to the other, HENRY T. RAINEY has been fighting the battles of democracy and for the greatest good to the greatest number for the people of this Nation. He has won the honor of the Speakership of this House, which he so richly deserves, and will continue to hold it. [Applause.]

For 26 years our beloved JOE BYRNS, most of the time on the Appropriations Committee, has stood as a watchdog of the Treasury and in serving as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Committee, and has contributed more than almost anyone else to the election of this Democratic House. [Applause.]

These great statesmen are men who are influenced by no impure motive, no personal aggrandizement, but who have a sole and single eye, a warm and devoted heart, devoted and dedicated to the best interests of our beloved country. I challenge anyone to obtain a statement from the President that he is not satisfied with their leadership or that he would desire to shelve them by giving them some other position. I believe I am in a position to say that there is not a syllable of truth in such a statement.

The Democratic membership of this House resents this assault. It has the effect of injuring these leaders in their races for reelection and to humiliate them in the eyes of their constituents. If there was ever any dissension or any doubt as to their popularity and reelection as leaders of the Democratic hosts of this House, that has been removed by the publication of this article.

The resentment has been such that, unsolicited, pledges have been made by such an overwhelming majority that their reelection of leadership is assured in the Seventy-fourth Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday during the debate on the Britten-McAndrews election contest resolution, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] addressed the House. Following his address he asked unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. That privilege was denied by the House. However, the gentleman immediately thereafter inserted several thousand words, including political vote charts and other matter, to which I have no objection; but he did invidiously and directly say a lot of unkind things about the Democratic members of that Committee on Elections No. 1, which I am sure those distinguished gentlemen would not acknowledge nor answer, but which I cannot let go by. I want to address the House a little later, and I have prepared a privileged resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I can assure the gentleman—

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman only had 1 minute, and that has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is not Speaker of the House. He thinks he is, but he is not.

Mr. Speaker, in the interest of those men on that side of the aisle who are too dignified and too honest—

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. I ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. SABATH. I can perhaps relieve the gentleman from his feelings—

Mr. BRITTEN. I decline to yield the floor.

Mr. SABATH. But this is in the interest of orderly procedure.

Mr. BRITTEN. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman charges that I did not obtain privilege to extend my remarks.

Mr. SNELL. O Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois had the privilege—

Mr. SABATH. No, I had permission, and the RECORD shows it.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has no right to make a point of order at the present time.

Mr. SABATH. The RECORD shows that I have obtained the privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution offered by Mr. BRITTEN:

"Resolved, That—

"Whereas it appears from the publication of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, April 26, 1934, that Hon. ADOLPH J. SABATH, of Illinois, addressed the House during the consideration of House Resolution 362, reported by the Chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 1 of the House; and

"Whereas it appears on page 7459 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that day the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] requested leave to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD, and this request was refused by the House; and

"Whereas the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] did immediately thereafter, in violation of the rules of the House, insert in the RECORD a long extension of his remarks, including tables purporting to be the vote results in various precincts of the Ninth Congressional District of Illinois, without proof of their authenticity or accuracy; and

"Whereas the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], in this irregular and unauthorized extension of his remarks, inserted the copy of a resolution which he had intended to offer to the House, the reading of which by the Clerk had been refused by the House; and

"Whereas he did, in violation of the rules of the House, include in his irregular extension of remarks a statement that was intended to cast invidious reflection upon the Chairman of the Elections Committee No. 1, as well as upon its members:

"Resolved, That all revision and extension of remarks herein referred to and appearing on pages 7456 to 7459 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 26, 1934, without sanction of the House and in contravention of the rules of the House, be expunged from the RECORD, and the Public Printer be directed to omit them from the public records and be prohibited from issuing any copy or copies thereof in pamphlet or other form from the columns of the daily RECORD."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order that the resolution does not present a matter of privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution states a fact which is not within the knowledge of the Chair or of the House until a check of the RECORD is made as to whether or not the gentleman did obtain unanimous consent.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have the RECORD before me and have checked it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] was refused unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is in error.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is incorrect. On page 7498, in the first column, near the bottom of the page, is the following:

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma, Mr. SABATH—

And so forth—

asked and were given permission to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

That is the same day; and that permitted the gentleman to revise and extend those remarks.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman should withdraw his resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a question of privilege before the House now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We cannot have two privileged questions pending at the same time.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman presented a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Let us dispose of the pending matter.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman should withdraw his resolution, in view of the showing in the RECORD.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my resolution and rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the resolution.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman ought to go further and apologize to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. BRITTEN. I will apologize to the gentleman a little later in the day if it appears that I should.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman, admittedly, has made a statement, undoubtedly unintentionally, which is not warranted by the RECORD. I think the gentleman should go further and apologize to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for the injustice done him.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will apologize to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] for having made a mistake in not being able to find in the RECORD that little thing that he slipped in there to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS. That is hardly fair.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, on last Thursday, during the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee on Elections No. 1 of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] took the floor in general debate; and after addressing the House he inserted several thousand words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. From them I shall read excerpts which apply directly to me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has not stated a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have not completed my statement of the question of personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman has gone far enough, that it is apparent the matter complained of involves no question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the gentleman from New York will allow me to finish stating my question for personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman has gone for enough to have made his point.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman from New York does not know how far I am going.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted in the RECORD a number of deliberate misstatements about me. This constitutes a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. SABATH. What are they? Read them.

Mr. BRITTEN. I shall read them if given a little time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will read the matter of which he complains.

Mr. BRITTEN. On page 73 of the transcript and on page 7458 of the RECORD the gentleman from Illinois said:

The recklessness and unworthiness displayed by my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, and his lawyers, in attacking the character of the contestant is deplorable.

Then he goes on further and reminds readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that Mr. McAndrews who was my opponent in the last election and who will be my opponent in the next election—

Resided for many years in that district, and in fact he has spent more time therein than has my colleague, the contestee.

That is one point.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that statement is not a reflection on a Member of Congress and does not give rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman will desist for one moment and let me conclude I will make a point of personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman is just trying to put this in the RECORD under the claim of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is one of them.

On page 73 of the transcript, page 7458 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the gentleman stated that—

Long before my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, or I reached the city of Chicago, Mr. McAndrews was favorably known to a majority of the people of that district.

Both of these statements are deliberate misstatements. I was born in Chicago 62 years ago.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the gentleman making a speech.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois has a right to make his statement on the question of personal privilege without a point of order being raised; then when his statement is concluded the gentleman from New York may make his point of order.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, Mr. Speaker; I make the point of order that the gentleman has stated enough.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I cannot be taken off my feet by the gentleman from New York while I am presenting my case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman has just made a speech, which he cannot do under the rules.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman from New York will sit down a minute I shall appreciate it very much. Some day I will do as much for him.

On page 73 of the transcript, page 7458 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted this language:

The charge made by the contestee—against the county judge and the election board, before the elections committee, was willful and malicious.

That is myself—

Mr. Speaker, every member of the Elections Committee will verify the fact that I have repeatedly eulogized this distinguished Democratic judge of Chicago.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman is proceeding as if he had been granted the right to be heard on a question of personal privilege. I make the point of order that the gentleman should state the language about which he complains, and not make a speech.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. I cannot understand how the distinguished leader on the other side can assume this attitude, after all the nice things that have just been said about him.

On page 74-C of the transcript, page 7458 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] states that he was treated in a most unfriendly manner by the Chairman of the Committee on Elections in connection with my case.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I have not concluded my case on the question of personal privilege. I will in a moment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has just read something which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is alleged to have said about the Chairman of the Elections Committee. He cannot rise to a question of personal privilege on what was stated about the chairman of that committee.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I proceed further?

On page 7458 of the RECORD there was inserted language which is defamatory in its character and which reflects upon every Member of this House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot rise to a question of personal privilege of every Member of the House. We will take care of ourselves. Let the gentleman from Illinois take care of himself.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not think the gentleman is able to take care of himself, and I am going to do it for him.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] made this statement:

In conclusion, I cannot refrain from stating that this arbitrary action, as well as the action of the gentlemen of the Elections Committee who first moved that the ballots be recounted and who some weeks later moved to rescind the action of the committee, is hard for me to comprehend. There is a great deal more that I could say which I shall refrain from saying at this time; but when the opportunity presents itself I will name the Members and some non-Members of this House who may be responsible for the reconsideration of the first action of the committee and for its refusal of the recount.

Mr. Speaker, that is a direct reflection and a direct imputation. He is pointing his finger at these gentlemen and me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot make a speech.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I am rising to the question of personal privilege, and I am trying to show why I should be entitled to the floor. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed, I will conclude my statement and not take up much time of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] cannot say anything except quote from the RECORD the language to which he takes exception.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed to state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, the parts which I have read are an insult to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not argue the matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, that is the point of my question of personal privilege. No Member of the House may insult another Member by an insertion of matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not argue. All the Chair desires to know is the language to which the gentleman takes exception.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have read the language, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has read the following language from a speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted in the RECORD under a leave to revise and extend his remarks:

In view of that fact and the manly position assumed by contestant, Mr. McAndrews, the recklessness and unworthiness displayed by my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, and his lawyers in attacking the character of the contestant is deplorable.

And again:

The charge made by the contestee against the county judge and the election board before the Elections Committee was willful and malicious.

The Chair thinks that the language which has just been read comes within the rule and that it affects the dignity and reputation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]. The gentleman is recognized on his question of personal privilege.

As to the other matter the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] read, the Chair holds that it does not constitute a question of personal privilege.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I realize the House desires to proceed with the stock exchange bill, and I am not going to take up any more time than is absolutely necessary. However, because of the insinuations and the innuendoes and threats that have been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], not necessarily against me but against a distinguished group of lawyers on that side of the aisle who are members of this Elections Committee and who have refused to be a party to the theft of a seat in the House, and who said so when they took the floor of the House here—I think in justice to them it is wrong to allow language such as has been inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Illinois to remain there.

This is my sole purpose in rising. The language was inserted in the RECORD because my opponent in the coming election this year is the same man who was my opponent a year and a half ago, and this language—oh, I could call it a number of names if I were on the stump—was inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] without a chance given to anyone to reply to it in the RECORD, and was inserted for the sole purpose of doing what was done 2 years ago in sending into my district under the gentleman's frank a lot of stuff attacking me. This was done 2 years ago. The gentleman has not the slightest conception of congressional courtesy.

Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. O'CONNOR, and Mr. BYRNS rose.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall withdraw that remark. I want the gentleman to know I am going to be very dignified about this matter.

Let me now take up some of these remarks. The gentleman, for instance, indicates I said something willful and malicious about the Democratic county judge, Hon. Edmund K. Jarecki. There are at least five or six gentlemen on the floor of the House at this moment to whom I have expressed my very highest regard for, and opinion of, Judge Jarecki. He has been the Democratic county judge for years, more or less dominating all of the election machinery in Chicago, and he is one of the outstanding and one of the highest type judges in the United States. I have repeatedly said this, but the gentleman, under his permission to revise and extend his remarks, could only have had one purpose in saying that I attacked the county judge, which was to make him feel unkindly toward me before the election next year. But even this, no matter what I may have said about the county judge, or anybody else may have said to the detriment of the character of the county judge, would not sway his honest decisions one iota. He is that type of man, and I know it.

The gentleman says I talked about the board of election commissioners in a way to put them in a bad light. They are also Democrats, and I have spoken in the very highest terms of them. Their honesty of purpose is unimpeachable, but, of course, they are still the election commissioners and will be next year when the election is on, and this insertion in the RECORD was made to hurt my character with them. I think it is mighty small and mighty cheap politics.

Let me go a little further, Mr. Speaker. I never attacked, as the gentleman indicates in his remarks, the character of James McAndrews, my opponent. On the contrary I have said a lot of nice things about him. He was a Member of Congress here for six terms from a district about 10 miles from the one in which I now live and in which he now lives. I did say he never made a speech during the last campaign, and he never did. This is no slander. It is a part of the record that he never did. There is no slander in this, and he probably will not make one in the next election, either, for reasons best known to himself.

The gentleman also says:

Long before my colleague, Mr. BRITTEN, or I reached the city of Chicago, Mr. McAndrews was favorably known to a majority of the people of that district.

Long before the gentleman or I reached Chicago McAndrews was popularly known in my district. This was before the Chicago fire in 1871, when I was born—think of it! The gentleman knows I was born in Chicago 62 years ago, but long before that time McAndrews was very popular in my district. [Laughter.]

I have made some inquiries about his popularity at that time, but it was said that the Chicago fire of 1871 burned all the records, and therefore we cannot find anything about this boy wonder. [Laughter.] The gentleman, of course, was not here at the time of the Chicago fire. He was in Czechoslovakia.

Mr. SABATH. That is right.

Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. May I ask the gentleman a question? The gentleman spoke about having been born at the time of the fire. I have always wondered what started that great conflagration in Chicago. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. I may say to the gentleman that I came after the fire, and that is probably the reason I get hot every once in a while.

The gentleman [Mr. SABATH] also states, on page 7458, in a number of charts and tables which he inserted, and which, by the way, only show the Republican vote and do not show the Democratic vote at all, and were merely intended to confuse—

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All the matter which was held a question of personal privilege is on page 7458, left-hand column, consisting of two sentences.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, does that mean I cannot go into the other points that reflect on my character?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the objectionable language referred to.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course, I know the Speaker will hold I cannot do anything that is not pertinent to the Speaker's ruling.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is entitled to justify himself with respect to the charges made against him.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman refers to the vote in every precinct and in every one of the wards, and, of course, is referring to the vote by which I was elected, but he only shows the Republican vote. The gentleman does not show the Democratic vote at all, and confusion, of course, will arise in the mind of anyone looking at these charts alone. They will lead them to think I got a tremendous vote in that district. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, out of 4 wards in my district I carried 2 and lost 2, and I did not carry any of them in a lopsided manner or by an excessive vote, despite what these charts show.

For instance, if he had included alongside of my vote the vote for Mr. McAndrews, he would have shown not 22 percent in the forty-second ward—

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is traveling outside of the language mentioned by the Speaker.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] inserted certain charts and tables—

The SPEAKER. That is not in issue.

Mr. BRITTEN. It was in issue in Chicago a year and a half ago. Do I understand the Speaker definitely rules that this language is not of a personal character, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] says in his extension?—

In conclusion, I cannot refrain from stating that this arbitrary action, as well as the action of the gentleman of the elections committee, who first moved that the ballots be recounted and who some weeks later moved to rescind the action of the committee, is hard for me to comprehend.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the Speaker has ruled against that language as being privileged.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BRITTEN. Where the gentleman from Illinois threatens the Members of the House because of the presentation of the election committee resolution, does not the Speaker feel that I am entitled to take the floor in that direction?

The SPEAKER. Not on that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] also desires some time, and I will couple that request with that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman from Illinois will speak the English language so we can understand him, we will go along with him.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I object to that—the gentleman has already referred to Czechoslovakia.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is a direct insult to the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. If my friend from Massachusetts says so, I will take that out of the RECORD.

Mr. McCORMACK. I consider it an insult to the Members of the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Massachusetts indicates that that language should come out of the RECORD, and I promise the House that I will take it out of the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that I may take that out of my speech.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I object.

THE QUESTION OF RIVERS, HARBORS, AND FLOODS

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an address that I delivered before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me today before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, which is holding its twenty-ninth annual convention in the city of Washington, D.C.:

The rivers and harbors of the country present national questions. A national policy is more important now than ever before to insure the continued improvement, development, and utilization of a national waterway transportation system, including rivers, harbors, lakes, canals, and connecting waterways. The program can best be supported with the national viewpoint in mind. The improvement should be well balanced and the public interests of the whole country must be considered.

Transportation is essential to the progress of any people. Water transportation has always contributed to making cities and countries great and powerful.

The great cities of modern and ancient times have been located on rivers, gulfs, seas, or oceans. New York is situated at the mouth of the Hudson and New Orleans is located near the mouth of the Mississippi.

History shows that the controlling influence in the rise and fall of cities and nations has been the relative costs of transportation. The life of all countries is characterized by the bloodless yet relentless warfare of trade and commerce.

The United States has unsurpassed inland and coastal waterways. With the greatest valleys and the most fertile plains in the world, surrounded by lakes, gulf, and oceans, and with the mightiest river system on earth traversing the interior valleys and plains, its facilities for both domestic and foreign commerce are unrivaled among the nations. Commerce makes and keeps a nation great. Agriculture and manufacturing are capable of greater expansion in the United States than in any other country. It is imperative that the United States assume and maintain its leadership in trade and commerce, domestic and foreign. Cheap transportation is necessary to the advancement of both agriculture and industry.

The maintenance of an adequate merchant marine is essential to the development of foreign commerce and imperative as a matter of national defense. The development of inland and coastal waterways and the promotion of domestic waterway transportation are equally important to domestic commerce.

The coastline of the United States, including the shore line on the Great Lakes, aggregates some 45,000 miles—almost twice the circumference of the earth. The rivers in number and length, in both navigation and power are unsurpassed.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS

From the first, the improvement of waterways was advocated as a part of the internal-improvement policy of the Nation. Washington and Jefferson were among the first advocates of inland waterways and harbor improvements. Federal appropriations for river and harbor improvements were begun more than 100 years ago. They were made more effective by the act of June 13, 1902, creating the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors. The best way to foster and maintain a national policy is to advocate only the projects that are sound from both an engineering and economic standpoint.

The first congressional appropriation for improving rivers and harbors was made in 1824. It was the era of canal building, to be followed by the turnpike. It was the beginning of railway construction; it was the time of Fulton, Stephenson, Livingston, and Macadam.

The history of transportation is the story of canals, waterways, roads, railways, highways, pipe lines, and airways. The stagecoach has been replaced by the motor bus; the sailboat has been superseded by the steamboat, and now by the steel barge. The primitive locomotive with its wood burner has been replaced by the modern giant coal-and-oil burner. Progress means change. In no other field have more transitions occurred than in the realm of transportation.

The inland waterways have had a contest from the beginning. The early canals were acquired by the railroads and junked. Steamboats were purchased and scrapped. Cutthroat rates were inaugurated by the railroads and traffic on the Mississippi River practically disappeared by 1900. Having obtained a monopoly, the railroads increased rates.

PANAMA CANAL

The construction of the Panama Canal resulted in favoring industries near the coast to the detriment of manufacturing in the interior. It diverted traffic from the transcontinental railroads to steamships. The Middle West was penalized. Rates from Kansas City to San Francisco are in excess of the rates on first-class freight from New York to San Francisco. Between the Rocky and the Appalachian Mountains, 70 percent of the agricultural products of the United States are produced, 50 percent of its manufactured products are supplied and 60 percent of its exportable surplus of agricultural products are grown. This vast area contains 98 percent of the iron-ore deposits, 82 percent of the coal, and 70 percent of the petroleum stores of the country. The raw material is available in abundance and with an outlet to the sea, the Mississippi Valley will become in deed and in truth the heart of the Nation. The people of the interior must have access to the ocean and to world markets. Cheap transportation is imperative.

COMPARATIVE RATES

Transportation is measured by freight rates in mills per ton-mile. In 1924 the average freight rate of the railroads was 11.32 mills per ton-mile. The average rate on the Great Lakes was 1.2 mills per ton-mile. From 1923 to 1928 the average rate of the Inland Waterways Corporation between New Orleans, La., and St. Louis, Mo., was 3.9 mills per ton-mile. The figures speak for themselves. Water transportation is the cheapest form of transportation. The Great Lakes provide the cheapest transportation in the world.

INVESTMENT

The total expenditures of the Government to June 30, 1932, for waterways aggregated $1,650,000,000, approximately a billion dollars having been spent for river and harbor construction, a quarter of a billion dollars for their maintenance, and a quarter of a billion dollars for flood control and navigation on the Mississippi and Sacramento Rivers. Great harbors have been constructed at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Houston, Galveston, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and at Cleveland and other points on the Great Lakes.

The prosperity of the Nation depends upon the prosperity of all parts of the country. If one section suffers at the expense of another, the whole Nation suffers.

The economic balance in the great Middle West can only be restored by cheap river transportation in cooperation with rail and motor transportation.

SUBSIDIES

Transportation is probably the best barometer of trade. If commerce declines, transportation feels the effects first—competition becomes keen. When freight decreases, competition increases. Rate wars result. At the present time a campaign is being waged against the Inland Waterways Corporation. Much is being said about subsidies to inland waterways.

All forms of transportation, with the exception of pipe lines, have at one time or another been subsidized. More than 200,000,000 acres of land were granted by the Government to the railroads. Many of the lands have been sold. They netted the railroads $374,411,176.39. It is estimated that the lands still owned by the railroads are valued at $387,970,275.82. I am not criticizing these grants. Cash donations, land subsidies, and stock subscriptions were made to railroads amounting to approximately $915,000,000. The Government actually subsidized the railroads for the 26 months of operation during the World War, and the 6-month guaranty period after the war in an aggregate amount far greater than the total sums appropriated for inland waterways since the beginning of the Government.

In opposing the legitimate operations of the Inland Waterways Corporation ostensibly to get the Government out of business but in reality to destroy water transportation, the railroads are pursuing a short-sighted policy. A campaign has been waged among railway employees. They have been beguiled by propaganda. They have been told that 195,000 railway employees have been thrown out of employment by the operations of the Federal Barge Lines. If this argument were sound, it would constitute an indictment of railway operation. Is it possible for the Federal Barge Lines, employing only 6,500 men, to do the equivalent work of 195,000 railway employees?

Again, the railways of the United States are the direct beneficiaries of 90 percent of the river and harbor appropriations. They are quite content for the Government to improve harbors at Portland, San Francisco, Galveston, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston for the accommodation of the railroads. They have been among the chief advocates of the improvement of the ports of the Great Lakes. They have been the beneficiaries of these improvements. Until the people of the Mississippi Valley are accorded the equivalent of the freight rates that obtain along the seaboard, railway opposition to improving the inland waterways will fall of its own weight.

Whenever any form of transportation fails to serve the public, that form of transportation must either readjust itself or fail. I am the friend of railways. They are entitled to a square deal, but railways must meet competition or, having fulfilled their mission, the railways will fail. Moreover, when the business of the country recovers there will be sufficient traffic for all. It is said that transportation doubles every 15 years. The solution is more traffic and hence more earnings. If railways will reduce instead of increase their freight rates, and if they will reduce their passenger rates, there will be more traffic and more income. Nothing will so quickly destroy a city or a country as excessive transportation costs.

INLAND WATERWAYS CORPORATION

The Inland Waterways Corporation was organized in 1924 under the Transportation Act of 1920 to increase and expand water carriers and rail carriers through cooperation so that there might be a coordinated and cooperative rail-water transportation system. The act was designed to encourage a water transportation and to foster and preserve in full vigor both rail and water transportation.

Every citizen of the United States is interested in the costs of transportation. It is reflected in the costs of living.

The argument against Government subsidy is the same argument that has been advanced by every transportation agency that was superseded and supplanted by those in existence today.

The United States will not abandon its investments in rivers and harbors, but it will maintain and complete the system and thus promote the interests of the public, which are paramount to the interests of any private or public industry. Public service rather than private profit is the slogan that should characterize the policy that will result in the maintenance and improvement of the waterways of the Nation.

The utilization of the Mississippi River and its navigable tributaries will benefit rather than injure the railroads. The Monongahela River in the Pittsburgh area carries 26,000,000 tons annually and yet the Pennsylvania Railroad has enlarged its Monongahela division four times. Manufacturers make great industrial centers and cheap raw materials are vital. The cost of transportation determines the location of industries.

The great aluminum plant at East St. Louis would not have been established without the cheap cost of transporting bauxite ore from the British Guianas by ship and thence up the Mississippi River by the Federal Barge Lines. All railroads that connect with East St. Louis profit by distributing the finished product. There should be cooperation rather than conflict between the waterways and the railroads.

The Inland Waterways Corporation is fulfilling its mission. Traffic is returning to the Mississippi River. The tonnage on the Mississippi today is twice what it was in the halcyon days of the palatial steamboats. The Inland Waterways Corporation carries annually about 1,700,000 tons of freight. In 1929, before the depression, it carried 2,114,470 tons of freight.

Water transportation is dependent upon navigable streams, suitable boats, adequate terminals, balanced freight, cooperation with the railroads and an equitable division of the freight rates. The economic salvation of the Mississippi Valley depends upon cheaper transportation rates, especially of raw materials and bulky commodities. The cities have cooperated. Minneapolis, St. Paul, St. Louis, East St. Louis, Cairo, Memphis, Helena, Vicksburg, Baton Rouge, New Orleans, Dubuque, Burlington, and Rock Island have erected terminals. The city of Greenville, Miss., has recently erected a terminal.

The Mississippi River is open to navigation from Chicago and St. Paul to New Orleans. Navigation on the Missouri to Kansas City will shortly be accomplished. Navigation along the Ohio River has enabled cheaper freight rates from Pittsburgh to New Orleans than obtain by rail from Pittsburgh to Baltimore although the distance to New Orleans is more than five times greater.

DEFINITE POLICY

Improvements for rivers and harbors are under attack. These attacks have been accentuated by economic conditions that have resulted in freight decreases. The opponents of Federal appropriations for rivers and harbors urge a change in governmental policy. In opposition to Federal appropriations for the construction and improvement of Federal works, it is urged that the United States abandon the policy of Federal appropriations that has heretofore obtained. It is now urged that improvements should be made by direct charges against the traffic. The policy that obtains along the Rhine and other European streams is being advocated as applicable to the United States; but our situation is vastly different. European conditions are not applicable here. A tax upon vessels and a lockage tax in our canalized streams would not suffice. They would hinder rather than help. The Rhine is an international stream—France, Germany, Holland, and Belgium are all interested. Most of the other large rivers in Europe are international streams. This is especially true of the Danube. Again, European streams are not comparable to the Mississippi and its tributaries. They are much smaller.

Our inland waterways are located entirely within the United States. They are in most cases interstate streams. There is no occasion to follow the European policy. All of the people interested are in the United States. No international problems are involved. It is a mistake merely to try something because it is new. European conditions, I repeat, are not applicable. The United States makes, instead of follows, precedents. With the largest inland waterways in the world and with the greatest resources on earth, the Federal Government should continue to promote the improvement of its rivers and harbors as a Federal problem, and at Federal expense. It will be more economical to improve our waterways year by year than to double either our highways or our railways. The remedy is not to abandon the American policy, but to preserve and expand that policy for the benefit of all worth-while rivers and harbors in the country.

FLOOD CONTROL

Closely allied with the problem of transportation is the question of flood control. Floods are the destructive enemies of transportation as they are of life and property. Sooner or later the losses of floods are absorbed by the Nation. With the building of cities, with the improvement of the country, and with the increase in population, the hazard of floods is becoming increasingly greater. Flood control along navigable streams is the proper function of the Federal Government. Congress has the power to regulate both foreign and domestic commerce. The power to regulate commerce includes the power to enact flood-control legislation in order to protect commerce and preserve life.

The problem of controlling floods as distinguished from the navigation of the stream in the case of the Mississippi River is not adaptable to local treatment. Minor local flood conditions may be handled by the local authorities, but general flood problems are beyond the capacity of the local interests to solve. Levees along the Mississippi River must hold waters that come from points as far east as Pittsburgh and as far west as Idaho and from all of the territory between the Alleghenies and the Rockies. The working of a suitable plan of control for the Mississippi and its tributaries is a problem of immense complexity. The problem can be solved by improving and increasing the channel capacity, by confining the flood waters between levees, by the construction of reservoirs, and by diversions. No one method alone is capable of solving the flood problems of the Mississippi River and its tributaries. A comprehensive plan will involve a combination of all the methods available.

The Mississippi flood of 1927 drove 700,000 people from their homes, resulted in the loss of at least 246 lives, and destroyed property and property values aggregating $200,000,000 to $400,000,000. The American public contributed for the relief of this disaster some $18,000,000. It was, in the language of Herbert Hoover, "Our greatest peace-time disaster."

There was a destructive flood in the Miami Valley in 1913, as a result of which 300 lives were lost with property damages of $100,000,000.

Prior to 1917 no Federal appropriations had been made for flood control. The appropriations were made for the Mississippi River, with the limitation they should be used only in aid of navigation. The Flood Control Act of 1917 for the first time gave recognition to the problem of floods, and provided for a partial contribution to improvements to prevent floods along the Mississippi River and along the Sacramento River, but it was not until the great Mississippi flood of 1927 that flood control on the Mississippi was adopted as a national policy. Previously the question had been how much the building of a reservoir or the construction of a levee would affect navigation.

There has been a change of consciousness. The Mississippi River and its tributaries are the property of the people of the United States. The system embraces 42 percent of the area of the United States and touches 31 of the 48 States of the Union. It constitutes a problem for national control.

The Flood Control Act of 1928 authorizing the appropriation of $325,000,000 is fundamentally sound. It provides that levees along the main river should be supplemented by diversions, floodways, outlets, and spillways. It is intended to solve the problem in the lower Mississippi Valley from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico, but the Nation will never be satisfied until adequate provision has been made for the solution of the problem along the entire river and its tributaries.

There are two problems in the Mississippi Valley: First, there must be relief from floods; secondly, there must be the creation and utilization of navigation to give the farms and the mines an outlet to the sea. The flood problems of the Mississippi River will never be solved until the problems along the tributaries have been solved.

For the past 15 years the Federal Government has contributed to the improvement of both flood control and navigation of the Sacramento River. Navigation obtains to a large extent, especially along the lower stretches of the Sacramento River.

The construction of Boulder Dam will provide for flood control along the lower Colorado in the Imperial Valley.

The improvements under the supervision of the Tennessee Valley Authority will result in flood control along the Tennessee River. The Public Works Administration in 1933 authorized the construction of the Bonneville Dam and the Grand Coulee Reservoir on the Columbia River and provided for the building of the Fort Peck Reservoir along the Missouri River. In aid of navigation, the Public Works Administration authorized the construction of a reservoir on the Tygart River, a tributary of the Monongahela River. It approved and agreed to pay approximately one half the cost of the building of a system of reservoirs along the Muskingum River in Ohio. These projects are being executed under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, except the Grand Coulee Reservoir, which is under the supervision of the Bureau of Reclamation. Some 4 years ago Congress appropriated money to provide against floods in Lake Okeechobee, Fla., as a part of the improvement of the interoceanic waterways of the Nation.

I have thus enumerated the flood-control projects of the Nation to which the Federal Government has contributed.

Probably the outstanding flood-control project constructed without Federal contribution is the Miami conservancy project along the Miami Valley in Ohio, built following the flood of 1913 at a cost of $30,000,000. It consists of a series of retarding dams and reservoirs and has protected the Miami Valley from overflow.

WATERWAYS EXPERIMENT STATION

For years John R. Freeman, the eminent civilian engineer, had advocated the establishment of a national hydraulic laboratory. One of the most constructive features of the Flood Control Act of 1928 was the provision for the United States Waterways Experiment Station, which is located at Vicksburg, Miss. The initial cost of the hydraulic laboratory was approximately a quarter of a million dollars. Without question it is the most complete hydraulic laboratory in the world. Already river and harbor works, as well as flood-control improvements are profiting as a result of experimentation. From time immemorial cut-offs were opposed by Mississippi River engineers. It was argued that they would destroy the channel below the cut-off and that they were wholly detrimental in alluvial valleys. Experiments thus far conducted indicate a complete change of view with respect to cut-offs. The experiments to date have been highly satisfactory, but, as usual, the Corps of Engineers are careful and conservative. There have been no large Mississippi floods since the experiments have been made. While optimistic, the Corps of Engineers await the testing of the experiments by actual floods. It is believed, however, that flood heights can and will be materially reduced by cut-offs that are being made in the vicinity of Greenville, Vicksburg, and Natchez on the lower Mississippi River.

The laboratory is being used for experiments in all river and harbor work. It will materially contribute to the solution of the problems of both navigation and flood control.

RESERVOIRS

Further and careful studies in flood control are demonstrating that reservoirs will largely be utilized in the control of the floods of the tributaries of the Mississippi River. While reservoirs located near the alluvial valley will be most effective in controlling the floods of the lower Mississippi River, there is a definite place for reservoirs in the upper stretches of the tributaries. The adopted project in the Mississippi Flood Control Act of 1928 is sound because it is capable of expansion. No work that is done under the act will be discarded or become obsolete as a result of the controlling of floods along the tributaries. It is capable of expansion to provide for flood protection in the backwater and the tributary areas. The same obligation rests upon the Government to protect the backwater areas that obtain along the Mississippi River.

SURVEYS AND EXAMINATIONS

Drainage and minor flood-control works along the streams and rivers of the United States have been constructed at immense costs to the taxpayers of the Nation. In many cases they were utterly inadequate. There had been no surveys of the rivers and streams along which they were constructed. In line with its policy of promoting the public interest in the Rivers and Harbors Act of January 21, 1927, provision was made for studies of approximately 200 streams and rivers in the United States, as provided by House Docket 308, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session.

On these streams, the Corps of Engineers were directed to formulate plans for the improvement of the streams for navigation, for flood control, irrigation, and hydroelectric power, and $7,322,400 was authorized to be appropriated for the surveys and examinations. Under section 10 of the Flood Control Act of May 15, 1928, the Corps of Engineers were especially directed to submit reports, as provided by said document 308, but with more comprehensive surveys and investigations, covering the main tributaries of the Mississippi River, including the Yazoo River in Mississippi. The report on the Yazoo River has been submitted and will be published in the near future. It will recommend the control of the floods along the Yazoo River system by the construction of a series of reservoirs near the foothills and will recommend the control of the floods in the backwater area by the building of a system of levees.

NATIONAL PLAN FOR FLOOD CONTROL

We hear much of national planning these days. National plans for flood control are now under consideration. An agency has been suggested for the supervision of further flood-control works along the Mississippi River, another agency for the east tributaries, and a third agency for the west tributaries of the main river. Agencies dealing with flood control in other rivers emptying into the Gulf and agencies for the rivers that find their way into the Lakes, and into the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, have been suggested.

We are likely to become topheavy with commissions. Too many executives result in inefficiency. The problems of rivers are similar.

The Corps of Engineers of the United States have had more experience and are better informed about flood-control problems than any other engineers in the world. They have been loyal and efficient. The Fort Peck improvement, the Muskingum project, and the Columbia River Dam, as I have stated, are being constructed under their supervision. They have advised the Administrator of Public Works respecting all flood-control and river-and-harbor improvements.

I advocate a policy of national flood control. The Mississippi River is the longest and the most important river in the world. The Mississippi Valley as a dwelling place for mankind is the most important territory on the globe. The plan along this river should embrace all its tributaries and should provide for floods along all of the tributaries.

What agency shall represent the public and the Government in the formulation and expansion of the plans for the further improvement of the Mississippi River system? The Corps of Engineers are familiar with all of the rivers of the Nation. They have studied them. They have examined them. The engineers of the Army are composed of the ablest engineers in the United States. The honor graduates of West Point have the privilege of an assignment in the Corps of Engineers. Graduates are sent to the leading engineering schools in the United States and foreign countries. Army engineers are thus among the best-educated and best-trained engineers in the world.

I believe that there should be a comprehensive plan for the Mississippi River system and that it should be under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers. I recommend the same course for the other rivers of the United States. In both planning and execution there must be an executive who has the final say. The Chief of Engineers should be at the head of both planning and execution. A division engineer may be immediately in charge of the Mississippi River system and other division engineers in charge of the systems in the other watersheds of the Nation, but in the interest of economy and efficiency and for the public good of the people of the United States I believe that the formulation and execution of policies should be under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, with the power and authority in him to utilize, in connection with the Army engineers, the best engineering talent among the civilian engineers of the country.

APPROPRIATIONS

The Congress of the United States levies taxes. The Congress should, therefore, provide for definite appropriations. In an emergency and to promote employment the prerogative may be delegated to another authority. Practically all public works in the United States have been investigated through the years by the Congress of the United States. Investigation by an independent agency in many cases results in duplication and in other cases in works that Congress has refused to approve.

If Congress is to levy the taxes, Congress should be the spokesman in the appropriations and allocations of funds for flood control and river-and-harbor improvements. I repeat, however, to emphasize, that the public interest in all projects must be apparent and that the projects must be sound. I have, therefore, urged that Congress resume its function of making direct appropriations for public improvements, including highways, rivers and harbors and flood-control works. The first step has been taken. Congress, for the fiscal year 1935, has definitely allocated and appropriated $29,000,000 for flood control and has made provision for the release of an additional $18,000,000 previously impounded by Executive order. There is thus available so that works may be planned and executed during the favorable seasons and weather, approximately $47,000,000 for new work and maintenance in the year 1935. I advocate a similar policy for highways and for river-and-harbor work.

As an advocate of the improvement of the rivers of the Nation for navigation and flood control, I maintain that no transportation will survive as long as some other form furnishes a cheaper and a better mode of transportation. I assert that this better and cheaper transportation will result through cooperation and coordination of waterways, highways, and railways.

The people of the Mississippi Valley are not selfish. They are interested in the progress of the people of all of the States of the Union. Whatever helps us will help others. We can only prosper as others prosper. We are all citizens of a common country, with a common destiny.

The United States has erected an imposing structure at Yorktown to commemorate the birth of the independence of the Nation. I believe that the sentiment of the words carved on that monument should characterize all of our plans and purposes for the improvement and advancement of the rivers and harbors of the United States. On that noble shaft are these words:

"One country—one constitution—one destiny."

AMENDING LONGSHOREMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 366 (Report No. 1395)

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 8057, a bill to amend the Longshoremen's and Harbor Workers' Compensation Act with respect to rates of compensation, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 30 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL OF 1934

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 363, for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, and ask that it be reported. The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 363

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 9323, a bill to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

With the following committee amendment:

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the usual 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY], if he desires to use that much time. I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am so very much interested in this rule and the proposed legislation that I shall refrain from answering my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTON], but I shall do so in the near future and point out to him that no injustice was done him by my extension of remarks and the statistics included in my speech, which do not descend to the regrettable depths of unfairness and viciousness he has displayed toward me.

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, the resolution before us is broad and liberal. It calls for 7 hours of general debate.

After that, notwithstanding the bill is of a very technical nature, the rule provides that the bill shall be read under the 5-minute rule giving each and every Member opportunity to offer amendments and to speak on the amendments.

I am of opinion that this is the most important piece of legislation that has even been considered by the Congress. For many years efforts have been made to regulate the stock exchanges. After every panic serious efforts have been made to enact legislation that would make impossible the panics that were brought about by the manipulation of the stock exchange. In 1894, after the 1893 panic, an effort was made to secure legislation. In 1908 a commission was appointed to investigate the stock exchange, and in 1912 a bill was introduced to accomplish that purpose. The Pujo Committee reported and demanded action in 1912. The bill was considered, but the same tactics that are pursued against this bill were utilized then to bring about the defeat or delay of the legislation.

During the last 30 days I have received, and each and every Member must have received, hundreds of letters and telegrams from misled business men telling us that this legislation will be detrimental to the best interests of the Nation. I say to these business men that they are misled. This legislation will restore confidence, will not injure legitimate business, and all it will do is restrict the gambling activities of a small group of men who have no interest in the welfare of the Nation, but who, regardless of the effect everybody knew it would have upon conditions of the country, ruthlessly manipulated the markets and brought about the conditions from which the Nation is now suffering. Had it not been for the manipulators of Wall Street, for the criminal inflation for which they were responsible and carried on in 1927, 1928, and 1929, the crash would not have occurred. The people who were responsible for the inflation of 1923 and 1929 are also the very men responsible for the crash in 1929. This legislation is absolutely necessary for the best interests of the Nation, because not until we pass this measure will confidence be restored. All this bill aims to do is to prohibit the reckless gambling and manipulation on the exchange.

I have here from an inside man a description of the stock exchange. He says:

1. Not one fourth of the transactions on the exchange are sales where the seller actually parts with the security, and is paid for it by the purchaser.
2. The exchange is, therefore, the largest gambling house in the world.
3. This gambling house is owned and controlled by its broker members.
4. The value of a seat on the exchange, depends upon the amount of play the game attracts.
5. Those who run the game are really the betting commissioners for the boobs who sit in the game.
6. The betting commissioners have looked in the hand of every one of the "boobs", know exactly what cards they hold, and the limit of their stakes.
7. Most important of all, they know at just what point the "boob" has put in a stop-loss order, hence they know just when the "boob" must take his loss, when the market is forced down.

The privilege of a seat at the gambling table in New York was worth as much as $650,000 at one time. True, it is not worth that much today, but that was the price in the good old days of 1929. No wonder that every ingenuity and every effort is being made to mislead the House and the Membership about this legislation now pending.

I regret that the propaganda going on is so unfair and unjustifiable. As I stated before, they are trying in every conceivable way to mislead the Members and the country in regard to the legislation. I myself am indeed grateful and overjoyed that I have the opportunity to speak for the rule that will make the legislation in order, because ever since 1929 I have appealed to the stock-exchange officials and I appealed to the then President, Mr. Hoover, urging that we suspend these operations. I have pleaded that they should stop short-selling and the many vicious activities that were detrimental to the Nation, but nothing has been done. They now say, "Give us a chance and we will amend our rules." They have refused to act before, and they will refuse to act in the future.

Regardless of what they promise, regardless of what they say, they are not sincere, they do not want any legislation, they believe that it is their own privilege and their God-given right to control this gambling den that brought about destruction to America, brought about the closing of our banks and manufacturing plants, nearly ruined all of the insurance companies, brought about the unemployment of 16,000,000 men in the United States and that caused untold hardships and suffering and, above all, that was responsible for thousands of suicidal deaths. I doubt very much that any flood, fire, or plague ever caused as much destruction and loss as the inflations of 1928 and 1929 and its resultant crash. In fact, it destroyed the values of not only stocks and bonds, but the value of city and farm properties, as statistics show that the value of listed stocks fell to the extent of 83 percent, causing a loss of more than $100,000,000,000. I say that had we had legislation of this nature on our statute books in 1893, 1907, and 1929 the then panics and losses would not have been possible. Therefore, I am amazed that so many well-meaning business men permit themselves to be used by the most vicious propagandists in the history of America. To the business men of America I want to say they should not be alarmed by this proposed legislation. Instead of stifling business it will encourage business and restore confidence. I invite them to read the financial reports of even the Republican newspapers. A heading on the first page of the financial section of a Chicago newspaper of April 26 reads:

General Motors Quarter Net Soars to 63 Cents—Profit is 500 Percent Over Same 1933 Period.

Power Output Reaches Best Level of Year.

Steel Activity Continues Rise to 56 Percent—Operations Gain Four Points for Week.

Another:

White Motor Gives Third 10-Percent Raise to Workers.

On the same page:

Dollar Rises Above Par to 59.11 Gold Cents.

Another reads:

Stewart-Warner Profit is $167,495 in First Quarter.

Still another on the same page:

Industrial Earnings Run Three Times Those Year Ago.

A further heading reads:

The First 51 Corporations to Report Show Total Net of $18,740,000, as Compared With $6,332,000 a Year Ago.

Other headings:

Sangamo Electric Boosts Pay 10 Percent; 700 Affected—New Car, Store Sales, Rise in Chicago Area.

From a New York newspaper of April 27 the following heading appears in its financial section:

Bank Reserves up $79,000,000 in Week.

And another from this New York paper:

Internal Revenue Shows Big Increase—9 Months' Total to March 31 Was $797,000,000 Above That of 1932-33 Period.

From a Washington newspaper of April 28:

Electric Output Reveals Uptrend—North American Official Reports Gain in April of Over 13 Percent.

Mr. Speaker, such are the headings in these Republican newspapers. They show that conditions are improving, notwithstanding the stock exchange scare statements.

I repeat that the passage of the bill will to a still greater extent stimulate business and improve conditions, and, therefore, it is manifestly unfair that this institution, through its activities, should create alarm just for the purpose of stopping the proposed legislation to regulate it.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, the stock exchanges have had plenty of opportunity to eliminate the vicious practices that have been going on, as has been testified to and disclosed by the Senate investigating committee. It is high time that the unscrupulous Wall Street investment bankers, who are part and parcel of the New York Stock Exchange, be stopped in reenacting shortly, as they would, another crash. Before concluding I want to congratulate our courageous President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, upon his determination to effect the passage of this proposed legislation, because I know that he recognizes the tremendous, powerful opposition, and, understanding the good that will be accomplished by the adoption of the bill, he remains praiseworthy steadfast for its adoption.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me call attention to the fact that the same tactics and the same fight have been waged against the Federal Reserve Act and other beneficial legislation by these overlords of high finance, which gives the lie to the selfish and unworthy lobbyists and propa-gandists who have tried to put the fear of God in everybody they could reach.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to oppose the adoption of this rule. I am of the opinion that the measure which will be considered on the adoption of this rule is one of the most important pieces of legislation that this or any other Congress has considered. It has been continually before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the last 8 or 10 weeks. Only the members of the committee themselves know how hard we have worked to try to put this legislation into shape to present it to the House. It has been a tremendously difficult task to undertake to write this legislation in order that Congress might consider it. I want to pay my respects to the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce [Mr. RAYBURN], who has worked hard in order to try to get this legislation before the House. It has been my pleasure and privilege to serve with him on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee for 18 years. I do not believe that in all my experience on this committee, any chairman has had such a tremendous task before him as has Mr. RAYBURN, chairman of our committee, during the committee consideration of this measure. [Applause.]

I am sure there are many good things in this bill. I do not question the right of the Federal Government to regulate stock exchanges. I think they should have been regulated long ago. We all know something of the manipulations and practices that have been carried on by some of the stock exchanges in the past. People who have invested their money in securities must look some place for protection. Therefore I believe it is absolutely necessary to pass legislation for the regulation of the stock exchanges, which will protect the people of our country who invest their money in securities. So with that part of the bill I am fully in accord.

But I feel confident that this measure goes far and beyond the regulation of the stock exchanges, by giving to the Federal Trade Commission the power to regulate industries, corporations, businesses, banks, and credits. Industry and business today want to be let alone for a little while. They want to try to get on their feet. They are trying to recover. They are doing everything that is humanly possible to try to bring our country back to a sound economic situation again; but they are afraid that the restrictions placed upon them in this bill will retard economic recovery and not assist it.

I have numerous letters and telegrams from industrialists, business men, especially those in the great industrial district in which I live, who are afraid of this bill. I know they are honest and sincere men. They have no desire to evade any law. I do not believe that they attempt to engage in any corrupt practices in placing their securities and stocks on the market. They suffered tremendous loss during the last 3 years of economic depression; but notwithstanding that they have kept their industries operating in order to try to give men work, to try to keep their families alive. They are afraid of this bill. They say it will make it hard for them to go forward and it will tighten up credits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. What industry wants today is a relaxation of credit, especially the heavy industries. If there can be a little relaxation of credit so that they can get credit money and put it into productive activity, we will step along pretty fast toward economic recovery.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would rather not yield at this time. I will yield later during general debate.

As I said in the beginning, there are many good things in this bill, but there are some parts of the bill, I believe, that should be modified and amended. It is not my purpose at all to try to make any fight against the passage of the bill. What I have in mind is that when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule we should try to amend some of the sections of the bill, so that it will make it a little easier for business and industry to get on their feet instead of making it more difficult for them to do so. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I had intended only to ask for time in the event there was opposition to the adoption of the rule. It seems that everyone concedes this bill is of such great importance that there should be consideration of it at this time; and therefore the lack of opposition to the rule.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cooper], who has just addressed you, expressed fear that in the administration of the act as it is proposed, in the event of its becoming law, it would tend to restrict credit and, therefore, interfere with the operation of business. The report on the bill expressly declares it to be one of the intents of the measure to prevent the concentration of money in the great centers where the exchanges operate, resulting in depriving financial or lending institutions in the outlying sections of the country of the ability to take care of the needs of the people. As a matter of fact, the consideration I have given the measure leads me to believe that that will prove to be one of its beneficial effects.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cooper] has paid his respects to the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Rayburn]. I invite the attention of the House to the report filed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Rayburn], for the committee, on this bill. Aside from the fact that it is a very eloquent document, it is one of the most informative statements I have read since my term in Congress, and will give you a very accurate picture of what is proposed in the bill and of the results it is expected to accomplish.

I take it that the bill is constructed largely along the line of the report of what is known as the "Roper committee." There, of course, is some departure from the report if, as a matter of fact, there was any intention in the first instance, conscious or otherwise, to follow it—on the part of the committee.

Those departures, according to the witnesses who testified, very materially improve the measure and give it better promise of good to the country as a whole.

There are, of course, important legal questions involved. There is the question of delegation of power on the part of Congress to an administrative agency; and then there is the main question as to the power of Congress to deal with the situation in any respect whatsoever.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 additional minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. So far as the delegation of power is concerned, I am not disturbed, because Congress states in definite terms what it desires accomplished and leaves to the discretion of the administrative agency how these results may best be obtained, holding the agency, of course, within limitations fixed by Congress—a maximum and a minimum, a high and a low, fixed by the Congress. In other words, Congress tells the Federal Trade Commission, which is made the administrative agency—and properly so, because it is the agency that administers the Securities Act, which is related to the pending bill—what it wants to accomplish, and lays down methods by which that result should be accomplished, and directs the Federal Trade Commission, the administrative agency, to produce those results.

In section 2 is set forth a declaration of fact which is intended to serve as a basis for the legislation. Some criticism has been made of section 2 because of the fact that Congress undertakes to legislate as a fact that which some feel should be left to the courts to determine. The declaration of facts as set forth in section 2 legislatively determined to be facts will in large measure relieve the courts of the necessity of deciding many important questions which otherwise might arise, and demonstrates the wisdom of the committee sponsoring the bill.

All of the powers of the Government are invoked in section 2, powers adjusted to peace-time conditions, and to those of war, those expressed and those implied, and all other powers; but, after all, you must come back to the proposition that if Congress has the power at all, and I think it has, to regulate these exchanges, it must be found in the commerce clause of the Constitution. There is a fear that there might be an effort under this act to regulate production; and, of course, production is not commerce. There is the fear that much might be attempted under this bill that is not properly within the power of Congress to do; but a careful consideration of the expressions of the court of last resort in many different cases that have gone to it for determination leads to the conclusion that the matter with which Congress is undertaking to deal, although in a sense it may be declared to be purely intrastate business, is so interwoven and mixed with interstate transactions as to become a part of them; and if Congress is to exercise its power and the exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce, it cannot stop at the point where it is insisted that transactions on the exchange are purely intrastate, but it must go all the way in the interest of a full and complete control and regulation of the problem.

The bill is deserving of careful study by the House; and particularly do I urge the membership of this body to read and to ponder the magnificent report filed by the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Rayburn].

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. PARKS. Calling the gentleman's attention to the language at the bottom of page 9, reading as follows:

(b) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board, as to matters within their respective jurisdictions, shall have power by rules and regulations to define accounting, technical, and trade terms used in this act, and such definitions, insofar as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall have the force of law.

Mr. COX. That language carries a very broad delegation of power, of course, but it is necessitated because of the inability of the committee to define those terms to meet all conditions—conditions now existing and conditions as they may change from day to day.

Mr. PARKS. Does not that delegate to the administrative board or commission the power to legislate for the Congress?

Mr. COX. As I say, it carries pretty broad power, but all in the interest of flexibility and workability.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Crowther].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a radio address delivered by my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. Fish], on the 26th of April 1934.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. HAMILTON FISH, Jr., of New York, over the National Broadcasting Co. network, Thursday evening, April 26, 1934:

We have heard a great deal of talk from the Democrats about the inflation of 1929, and silly statements that it was caused by the Republican tariff. We Republicans have nothing to apologize for in giving the American people the highest degree of prosperity ever known in any Nation in the world between 1921 and 1929 under a protective tariff system and successive Republican administrations. During those years the American wage earners were the best paid, the best housed, the best fed, the best clothed, and the most contented in the world. The Republican Party gave the American people an overabundance of prosperity, a veritable surplus of prosperity, and they abused it by being wasteful and extravagant. They followed the lead of the big international bankers and money changers and gambled and speculated with their earnings made in those prosperous times in the hope and delusion of becoming rich overnight without work or effort.

Did the Democratic Party point out the menace of the inflation at that time? It did not. Its present chief spokesman on monetary policies, Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale University, stated in 1929 that the existing high prices would continue indefinitely and that the peak had not been reached. Back in 1928 Alfred E. Smith, the Democratic standard bearer, came out openly for the maintenance of the protective tariff principle as being in the best interests of American labor and industry.

The present Democratic administration, however, talks in general terms about the high rates of the 1930 tariff bill, but is unable or unwilling to particularize on any schedule or on any item and fails to specify what rates are too high. The protective tariff system has built up the industries and the standards of wages and living in the United States and the attitude of the President imperils the welfare of our workingmen. American labor declines to compete with the poorly paid labor of Europe, Asia, or the forced labor of Soviet Russia.

President Roosevelt evidently cares little for the Federal Constitution or our representative form of government, or he would not have asked for unlimited powers to make reciprocal trade agreements with foreign nations. The request in itself is unworthy of the President, and must be another "brain trust" proposal entered into without mature consideration. I would have no objections to giving that power to a nonpartisan tariff commission, provided it could report back to the Congress for final approval. I would favor such a policy in dealing with Canada, Mexico, and Central and South America. We should be willing to make trade concessions to these countries which are our natural markets, but I am bitterly opposed to placing such unlimited power in the hands of any individual in direct violation of the Constitution.

The hardest blow ever dealt our democratic system of government is the request made by the President on the Congress to abdicate its constitutional powers to enact tariff legislation, which includes the taxing power.

The conferring upon the President the right to make trade agreements without the final sanction of Congress is not only unconstitutional but is an outright betrayal of our representative form of government. It amounts to an open admission by Congress that, after 145 years of dealing with tariff legislation it is now incompetent and unfit to legislate properly, intelligently, and in the public interest. Members of Congress are called upon to violate their oath of office to uphold the Constitution and betray representative government by abjectly surrendering their taxing powers to the President. When we do that we become nothing more than rubber stamps. We have already provided for a 59-cent rubber dollar, and now we are asked to rubberize the Constitution of the United States.

The President, in his recent N.R.A. speech, used these words: "The real truth of the matter is that for a number of years in our country the machinery of Democracy had failed to function." The President is not helping to uphold our American ideals and traditions by joining the hue and cry and carping criticisms both from within and from without our country against our free institutions.

For a number of years Mussolini, Stalin, and Hitler have been making public statements about the dismal failure of democracy, and particularly of the failure of parliamentary or representative government to function. They need no longer laugh up their sleeves, but if this bill is enacted into law they will cry out from the house tops the doom of democracy. What a travesty, without rhyme or reason or any emergency except a manufactured one, it would be for Members of Congress to abdicate their main powers and functions and help to destroy the usefulness of Congress and our legislative system of government. To me it is a tragedy far beyond the merits or demerits of the pending legislation.

Both my father and grandfather, of the same name, served in the Congress and no President, no matter what party he belongs to, can persuade or coerce me to betray my trust and help destroy our representative system of government which in the past has been the pride and glory of freemen and of a mighty Republic.

Why sacrifice that which has been tried in the darkest days of Civil War and in the midst of a World War to turn from our representative and legislative form of government to giving dictatorial powers to the Chief Executive? He holds no mandate from the American people to destroy American industries and the American market for goods produced by our own wage earners. Up to recently the United States has been the greatest free-trade country within its own boundaries in the world. However, this administration, by the use of subsidies and processing taxes on cotton and foodstuffs, has virtually imposed heavy duties on the American people for purchasing their own goods and mirabile dictu now proposes, through reciprocal trade agreements to show favoritism to the goods produced by cheap foreign labor in Europe, China, Japan, and Soviet Russia.

Thomas Jefferson would turn in his grave at the thought of transferring such autocratic and despotic taxing powers to the Chief Executive. Where are the constitutional and Jeffersonian Democrats in this contest against an economic dictatorship? If they vote for this bill in the Congress, it must be in open violation of every principle of Jeffersonian democracy. If they vote for this bill, it is a plea of confession and avoidance. They must confess to their constituents back home that as a party or individually they are not qualified to legislate or to act in a representative capacity in accordance with the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and in order to avoid the natural consequences of their incompetence must turn the entire tariff powers over to the President and the "brain trust."

What will be the logical answer of the people back home? "We sent you to Washington to look after our interests and to legislate intelligently and not to abdicate your constitutional powers and set up an economic dictatorship. If you are either unable or unwilling to perform your constitutional legislative duties, why we will look around and get someone who will." The price of betraying their trust as representatives of the people back home warrants defeat at their hands.

Has the flame of liberty burned so low that Members of Congress can betray the constitutional rights of a free people by turning the taxing power over to the Chief Executive without a remonstrance? Have the memorable contests and oratory of John Hampden in England, Mirabeau in France, and James Otis and Patrick Henry in our own country against taxation without parliamentary representation been all in vain? As James Otis pointed out, this principle caused one English King to lose his head and another to lose his crown, and he might have added it also caused the American revolution. Must we again revive this age-old fight? There is no alternative if this tariff bill is enacted into law.

Our revolt against England was because of taxation without representation. For that principle our forefathers fought bitterly, even sacrificing their lives in order to establish it for all time and for the benefit of Americans of succeeding generations. This is the heart and foundation of the Declaration of Independence, and was quickly transplanted into our Constitution. The whole frame of the Constitution was to protect that principle. The three distinct branches of our Government—the legislative, executive, and judicial—were set forth in the clearest and strongest language possible, in order that there be no infringement by one branch of the Government upon the other. And those great makers of the Constitution imposed the important task of taxation upon the Congress because the Congress is the direct representative of the people. Do you now wish to sacrifice that great and tried principle and turn it over, in violation of the Constitution, to the branch of the Government having no power whatever to tax? That is what this tariff bill means. It is the end of taxation by the direct representatives of the people and a restoration of taxation without representation, which caused the Revolutionary War.

The next national campaign will then have to decide as between the restoration of our American representative form of government and a socialistic dictatorship. On that issue of Americanism against socialism there can be only one answer, no matter what other issues are injected into the campaign.

What is needed badly at this juncture of our economic life, when business is at a low ebb and struggling to work its way out of a lengthy depression, is sound common sense, and there seems to be little of it. What is really needed is a restoration of business confidence in order to turn the wheels of industry and provide employment. However, business, instead of being encouraged, is discouraged at every turn by new shackles imposed by the "brain trust" and by doubts and uncertainties engendered by the proposed tariff bill. What is needed is the restoration of individual effort and initiative which has made our country the greatest, richest, and freest republic in the world. Instead, the "brain trust" promotes collectivism and regimentation and rushes from one socialistic experiment to another.

The disastrous defeat of the Republican Party in 1932 left but a small number of us in the House of Representatives to carry on sound Republican principles. Although somewhat dazed by the extent of our losses, we were not disheartened, knowing well the incapacity of the Democrats to function as a national party and to keep within bounds of reason and govern with moderation.

The Republican Party must not remain supine any longer. We must not look backward; economic conditions have changed. We must go forward on a constructive, liberal platform in favor of a square deal for both capital and labor. We must stand, as we have always stood, against state socialism, and for a sound currency, the protective tariff, and for the Federal Constitution as the rock upon which our constitutional rights and liberties are founded.

With malice toward none and charity for all I have presented my views without fear or favor on the pending legislation authorizing the President to enter into trade agreements with foreign nations which, even if held constitutional, would create further uncertainties and demoralization of American industry.

Canada, Great Britain, and other nations are emerging or have emerged from the world depression without indulging in socialistic panaceas, while the United States staggers along under a rapidly increasing burden of debt, with business confidence lacking and private enterprise discouraged and all but destroyed.

Let us give business a chance, remove the heavy hand of Government control and regimentation, and let the Federal Government come out openly and say to American business, "We are with you, not against you; you are entitled to make a reasonable profit; we believe in private enterprise and not in Government ownership." If the Government would give such assurances, it would restore confidence overnight, and the wheels of industry would begin to hum and provide permanent employment for millions of loyal American wage earners.

Let us preserve the American market for American labor and uphold the standard of wages and living that American citizens have been accustomed to in the past. Let us stand firmly for the maintenance of the Constitution and our representative government, and proclaim in no uncertain language that there is no room for socialism, communism, or fascism, or any other foreign form of dictatorship in the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, as I view this situation it is a question of legislating either for the few or the many. We have heard from the few, by telegraph, telephone, and letters. We have not heard from the many. But the many are watching us, and they are expecting us to enact legislation which will protect them in the future. They are thinking of what happened to them in 1929, and they do not want that to happen again. Can you blame them? The country was shocked by the evidence brought out at the Senate committee hearing, and people look to us to do something that will cure that evil.

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. I too come from a great industrial center, the same as he does; a greater industrial center than he comes from. A month ago a hundred business men from St. Louis came here greatly excited about this bill. We had meetings, and I suggested to them that they place their views and objections in writing, pointing out where the bill was going to be harmful, and give the memorandum to the chairman of the committee. They followed the suggestion. Yesterday I received a telephone message from the man whom I considered chairman of that delegation telling me that they were satisfied with the bill as reported, and that they did not think it could be improved upon on the floor of the House. The gentleman that called me on the telephone is president of one of the greatest chemical companies in this country. They are going back home because they say they are satisfied. They were over-scared, and they had no reason to be scared. They know what was in the original bill and they know what is in this bill. They are satisfied, and if they are satisfied I take it that when other business men learn what is really in the bill they will be satisfied.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Surely the gentleman would not compare this measure with the measure that was originally introduced.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I do not compare this measure with the one that was originally introduced. I realize many changes have been made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were excited over the first one.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. May I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] again that the delegation that came from my city, through the man I considered to be their chairman, called me on the telephone and withdrew objection to the measure? If our business men do not object to this bill, I cannot understand how Ohio business men will object to it. I have not heard from the people who were here in the interest of the stock brokers. Their representatives were here for weeks, and they, too, offered suggestions, some of them I understand being accepted by the committee.

I am satisfied that the bill is sound, that it is what the country needs, and I propose to support the bill. [Applause.]

Business might not want to be regulated now, but it had no objection to being regulated a year ago, when it came here and begged the President to help. He has helped, and as a result of that help they see light where a year ago all they could see was a black cloud. If they could trust the President a year ago, it seems to me they can trust him now. Had the Securities Act of 1933 and this bill been a law 10 years ago the crash of 1929 would never have happened. We do not want another disaster such as we experienced in 1929, and the way to prevent it is to pass this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The previous question was ordered.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 9323, with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House for the past 9 weeks has been wrestling with the problems raised by this suggested legislation.

A draft of a bill was submitted to Senator FLETCHER, of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee and to me as Chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We took the draft bill as a basis for discussion, began hearings. For 5 weeks, with an intermission of 1 week, we conducted hearings and those who were in so-called "opposition" to the legislation had at least three fourths of this time. To every section of the country and to every interest affected opportunity for hearing was accorded.

The bill that is before you today, it matters not what the propagandists who oppose any sort of legislation may say, is the bill of no one man or group of men, except the 25 members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House. Partisanship has been abolished in the committee during the hearings and during the consideration of this bill in executive session, and may I pay to my Republican colleagues on the committee the compliment which I believe they, as well as my Democratic colleagues, deserve for the way in which they went about the solution of this problem. Especially do I want to remark about the two minority members of the subcommittee, Messrs. COOPER and MAPES. They were courteous and cooperative with me throughout. May I pay a special compliment to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] for his help, his wisdom, and his good judgment in working out the definite and concrete provisions of the bill. I congratulate him and thank him for the way in which he has cooperated with me.

Few bills have ever had such thorough consideration as this stock-exchange bill. As a practical matter, the matters with which it deals have been the subject of hearings ever since the investigation of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee started some 2 years ago. And to complete the certainty that the bill in its present form has been given consideration at least so far as hearing opposition is concerned, we have worked out the terms of this bill under the pressure of the most vicious and persistent lobby that any of us have ever known in Washington—a lobby that has relentlessly opposed the bill, not only in the original form, but in the present form as my committee brings it to you, and which would, I am convinced, protest against it in any form so long as there was a tooth left in it.

Before we begin discussing the provisions of the bill in its present form, and consider objections still being made to it, I want to talk about that lobby, because the possibility that that lobby has inspired most of the protests against the bill is something which has to be taken into consideration in valuing those protests fairly. I am not suggesting that persons affected by a proposed regulation have not the right to protest fairly against it to the limit of their powers. I do not object to the effort of the New York Stock Exchange and of other exchanges to rally brokers against the bill on the frank ground that it will cut down on the profits they can take from the public. But I do object to the unfair and insidious campaign of exploitation of ignorance which the stock exchanges have waged to get business, banks, investors, and anyone else they could reach to pull their chestnuts out of the fire with exaggerated interpretations of the bill and terroristic prophesies of general disaster. My experience with those who have personally interviewed me to protest against this bill and thereby given me a chance to cross-examine them on what they really know about it, has convinced me that not one critic in five hundred has even carefully read the bill or the sections he came in to talk about. They have been simply and sincerely following like so many sheep the suggestion carefully planted in their minds by those who want to prevent this or any other kind of effective stock-exchange legislation from being enacted at this session. As I have said, I believe in encouraging frank and honest and intelligent protest by those who know what they are talking about. But I do resent a deliberate campaign to swamp Congress and the press with a false appearance that the thinking criticism of the bill is much wider than it is.

There has not been a bill introduced into the Congress of the United States in all the years that it has been my privilege to serve in this body that has been attacked as viciously and in many instances as senselessly as this legislation has been attacked. Propaganda unequaled by any that I have ever before witnessed has been leveled against this legislation, against the members of the committee, and especially against the chairman of the committee.

I resent, as I think does everyone in this House, the campaign of personal pressure that has been carried on against every Congressman in this House, and I do not need to expand on the tactics of that campaign. There is not one of us who has not recognized how subtly and how cleverly the sources of pressure against us have been chosen, how there have been sent against each of us the most carefully chosen delegations of our personal friends and of our political friends, nor how bluntly there has been drummed into us the fact that this is an election year, when we need friends. These things do not need to be told, except to assure each of us that his own experience has been repeated by every other one of us.

But I do think that there have been certain phases of this campaign of manufacturing public opinion that are probably only best known to those who have actually been working with the bill. For instance, take the flood of letters we have received. It is commonplace talk that it has been an inspired flood. But only an analysis of a representative group of those letters will show how inspired and how untrustworthy they are. As the best illustrative sample I have had an examination made of approximately 5,000 letters and telegrams received by the President. I have those communications here with me and any unbeliever may examine them if he wishes.

Mr. AYRES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield—not for a question but to ask if the gentleman is going to include those letters in the RECORD?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; some of them. The first interesting revelation is that apparently even the authenticity of some of this mail is not above suspicion. A letter from Pittsburgh makes the following interesting revelation:

On Monday or Tuesday of this week a petition was sent to the President with many forged signatures. This petition was dictated and placed in the customer's room of — (brokerage firm), of this city, by the manager, Mr. —. It did not bear the firm name, as they explained they wished it to appear as coming from those outside the market.

I saw Mr. — add 9 names to the list; Mr. —, an employee, added 2, as did Mr. —, another employee. I saw many others, whom I did not know, write several names at a time. All employees were compelled to sign, and several customers who had previously refused were reminded they should sign. I learned later these customers had weak margin accounts.

In the light of this sort of attitude it is significant that the names signed to 50 communications from Pasadena, Calif., alone could not be found by the Postal Service or in the city directory.

But beyond the problem of genuineness, internal evidence makes it clear that the vast majority of the letters are of the chain variety written not of the writer's own free will and consideration but as the result partly of compulsion and partly of ignorance bred of a fear carefully nurtured by a whispering campaign. Three sources of this inspiration are particularly clear in the letters I have here. One is the campaign of brokerage houses among their employees and customers. Very early in this propaganda business I picked up this interoffice wire from a brokerage house in New York to all its branches:

REGARDING FLETCHER-RAYBURN BILL

Will you please ascertain and advise what is being done by concerted action of savings banks, corporations, listed or unlisted, insurance companies, in your territory in the way of organized effort for the fight on the above bill.

Are your employees alive to the fact that with the passage of the bill a great many of them will be out of employment?

Are they writing their Senators and Representatives? If not, they should do so at once, using their own note paper, not firm paper, and writing in their own way, protesting the passage of a bill which will rob them of employment. Please advise.

I do not doubt that every brokerage house in the country waged a similar concerted campaign to create protest against this bill. If you want to know one way in which they worked, remember the language of that letter from Pittsburgh about the forged names:

The employees were compelled to sign, and several customers, who had previously refused, were reminded they should sign. I learned later these customers had weak margin accounts.

But not all customers and employees were fooled or intimidated. Listen to this one:

PASADENA, CALIF.

A few minutes ago a broker from the Pasadena office of — & Co. called my father asking permission to sign his name to a telegram criticizing the Fletcher-Rayburn bill, all expenses to be paid by the brokerage house.

It is not justice that such communications as these should influence our President and representatives. After much thought I have come to the decision independently that the Fletcher-Rayburn bill should be made a law.

And here is an account of the campaign in New York:

LONG ISLAND, N.Y.

May I, as an American citizen and an admirer of the new deal, take a few moments of your valuable time and give you an interesting but nauseating sidelight of the Wall Street viewpoint of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill.

All the brokers and big-money men have started a campaign of their own in an effort to defeat the passing of this bit of legislation. They have warned their employees that if the bill passes they will all lose their positions, as their business simply cannot flourish under the new regulations; next, each employee and every member of his family were told to write to their Senator and Congressman protesting the passing of such bill—form letters were given to all the men to take home so the folks at home could get an idea of what to write.

But that isn't the worst offense. Yesterday each and every clerk was made to put up 50 cents toward lawyers' fees, which these "big shots" are going to hire to fight this bill. If they must fight, why can't they hire their own lawyers instead of taking it from the clerks who are only making $16 and $18 per week? Have you ever heard of anything more nauseating? The clerks don't dare refuse—for their jobs are at stake—the white-collar class is the most underpaid class in our whole American system, and nothing can be done to help them, because they haven't the initiative to organize and fight for their rights.

I don't think any of those clerks would oppose the bill if they weren't threatened with unemployment and made to write those letters under duress. It is sickening to think that these millionaires who have got the country in chaos in the first place should now use their employees as tools to fight the Government.

P.S.—If you want to print this, please omit my name, as I would lose my position.

From Boston, Mass.:

The letterhead above will identify me as at least for the present being employed by one of the common sources which you referred to in your letters to Senator FLETCHER and Representative RAYBURN. Probably with my attitude in support of your principles and my utter disgust at the obnoxious abuses of the public trust in this business I will not be here long. In fact, I am told by a member that feeling the way I do I am in the wrong business.

It has been very interesting to me to observe the common source battling your desires for right with mass meetings, petitions to be signed under virtual threats, newspaper articles, raising funds for committees, and a most complete effort at regimentation of business corporations, chambers of commerce, advertising agencies, investment services, counselors, et al., by means of public speakers over the radio, and public assemblies and circulars, one of which I am enclosing for your amusement. Also letters by the many to Senators, Congressmen, and committeemen, from persons of and under age claiming Democratic political faith, falsely in many cases, but that if this bill is passed it will make violate their constitutional liberty, rights, etc. In fairness to many of these writers I would say that they are right in thought but frightened to action against their better judgment.

Now, as a customer's man and naturally still desirous of being able to earn a living I have read the bill carefully and I see that it contains nothing that I will object to. The means of administration of the bill are above my ability to argue. Whether the Federal Trade Commission should be the supervisory board I cannot say, but certainly not a committee made up of stock-exchange members. Likewise, whether the Federal Reserve bank should have control over margin requirements I cannot say, but they should be made standard by a law. I believe, in fact, that the method of control of margins being argued is merely a camouflage and in reality what the propagandists are really fighting for are lower margin requirements instead of who should control them.

May I say that I hope your Congress will not be influenced against their good judgment in support of your wishes * * *.

Here is a letter from Los Angeles describing the campaign among brokers' employees in that city:

They were instructed not to write these letters on a typewriter and not to mention their firm's name. Then they had to take these letters to their employer in an unsealed envelop so that he may examine its contents.

San Francisco, Calif.:

We all had to sign a petition to you yesterday. Please have someone take a knife and cut my name out. I have to have a job and just had to sign or quit.

When this bill was first introduced, a great many said we ought to know what the Federal Reserve Board thinks and what the Treasury Department thinks. It was committed to their hands for 8 days and they went over it line by line, and then Governor Black, of the Federal Reserve Board, had the courage to come up and say that he had read the bill from end to end and he thought it was a workable bill. I shall refer to him a little later. Mr. Smith, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, came up and said all in favor of it that he had been instructed to say.

Now, here are some letters that would appeal to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], since he gave out his learned statement this morning with reference to "the boys" that he claims wrote this bill.

One correspondent, giving an address in Gloucester, Mass., wrote on March 22:

I have been studying the new bill for stock exchanges as recently reported by the committee and I cannot see that there has been much improvement in it over the original draft. The only thing I can think of when I visualize the workings of the bill is good old Russia. We seem to be drifting there fast.

The following day a letter signed with another name, giving an address in Saugus, was written as follows:

I have been studying the new bill for stock exchanges as recently reported by the committee and I cannot see that there has been much improvement in it over the original draft. The only thing I can think of when I visualize the workings of the bill is good old Russia. We seem to be drifting there fast.

On the same day a third letter, signed with still a third name, was written from Braintree Highlands, Mass., saying:

I have been studying the new bill for stock exchanges as recently reported by the committee and I cannot see that there has been much improvement in it over the original draft.

The only difference between the third letter and the other two is the failure to think of "good old Russia." I have only read the first paragraph in each case, the remainder of the letters is virtually identical. The stationery on which these three letters are written differs only in the color of the border.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will ask the indulgence of the committee that I may continue until I get a little further along.

Mr. RANKIN. I think Greece and Turkey should be mentioned since Mr. Insull has been over there.

Mr. RAYBURN. There are two typewritten letters apparently from stenographers on plain stationery giving a home address and signed by the stenographer. But habitual honesty led the purported author to place the customary initials in the lower left-hand corner and these reveal that the letters were dictated to the writer by someone else, probably the employer.

And let me say to you about this bill, the impression has been created that everybody who operated on an exchange, that everybody who was a member of an exchange, that everybody who was a manufacturer or a business man is opposed to this legislation; and yet men came to my office and filed strong statements advocating a strong stock exchange bill and asking me to put their statements in the Record without filing their names.

One gentleman who is a big broker on the New York Stock Exchange came to my office and said, "I think you have a good bill, with two amendments." We went over his two suggestions, and after discussing them with him, found he had been misinformed about what they meant, and he said, "The people who have been talking to me did not understand this bill as you have explained it." Knowing he is a man of high type and an important broker on the great exchanges, I said to him, "Then it looks to me like you could help us stop some of this propaganda. You say you are for a strong bill and that you know about these evils that should be corrected." He said, "Well, I am for a strong bill. I am for this legislation. These evils should be outlawed and should be corrected, and if it were necessary for me to lay my head on the block in order to get a good strong bill, I would do it; but that is exactly what it would mean. I have a house in New York and several branch houses throughout the country and 800 employees in my houses. Some of them violate some rule or regulation of the New York Stock Exchange every day and they are passed over, but if I put myself up in opposition to them as favoring a good strong bill, they will destroy me by 10 o'clock in the morning."

Business men throughout the country have come to me and said that they wanted a good strong bill.

But here is a letter that caps the climax. Three writers ask in identical words, "What would Jefferson think of the Fletcher-Rayburn bill? He would, of course, use every influence to defeat it." May I ask you what that great democrat—not speaking in a partisan sense of the word—what would that great democrat, who believed in honesty in Government and honesty in all the affairs of men, have said about 1929 and the conditions and the practices that brought about the loss of untold millions to the people of this country? What would Jackson have said, what would Lincoln have said, what would Cleveland have said, what would Theodore Roosevelt have said? They would have said the same thing, that this President Roosevelt today says; that he "wants a law that will prevent the elements getting so mixed that it will bring about conditions like we had in 1927, 1928, culminating in 1929." [Applause.]

A representative of one of the large exchanges came to my office one morning and said, "Since you revised your bill"—that is, the first revision (the subcommittee and the full committee took 2 weeks to revise the revision)—"since you revised your bill, with four changes you have got a workable bill. I should like to come before your committee and be heard." I said, "You have had three quarters of the time in opposition to the bill, but tomorrow I will give you 30 minutes."

The next morning he came in and had 30 minutes and presented his four amendments.

Then I asked him the question, "If we were to adopt your four suggestions, would you support the legislation?" He threw his hands in the air and said, "No. The bill is unconstitutional. It is unworkable, destructive and not constructive."

Now, if the Membership of the House expects any man or any group of men to write any sort of a bill or law that will be accepted and endorsed by the people who do not want any sort of regulation, then they are mistaken. It matters not how you revise this bill, not what you take out of it, the people who operate the exchanges do not want it. They want self-regulation; and when temptation comes, self-regulation will mean the kind of regulation you had in 1929.

The New York exchange holds itself up by rules adopted recently establishing self-regulation and say that such rules ought to be sufficient. But it must be remembered that the New York Stock Exchange is not the only exchange in the country, and furthermore, the New York Stock Exchange, if it can pass a rule, can revoke that rule as well.

We want to lodge the authority, power, and direction somewhere in some agency of the Government as representing the people of the country, with the right to approve or disapprove the rules and regulations of the exchanges, and with the power and authority to enforce the rules and regulations if in the public interest it is found necessary.

Another clear source of inspiration for these letters in addition to the pressure brought by brokers' houses on their customers and employees is the propaganda conducted by many of the larger corporations of big business men. For example, the Associated Gas & Electric Co., the utility now under investigation in New York State, relayed to thousands of small, ignorant stockholders, who could not understand the bill even if they had an opportunity to read it, the exaggerated account of it given by the New York Stock Exchange.

Many almost illiterate stockholders and bondholders have been frightened by this campaign into thinking that passage of the bill will destroy what little value remains of the securities previously sold them by high-pressure methods, and have written pathetic letters often enclosing the company's circular or mentioning it by name.

An organization calling itself the Chicago Association of Commerce has issued a circular beginning as follows:

The Chicago Association of Commerce, with a membership of some 4,000 business houses located in the Chicago metropolitan area, opposes S. 2693 and H.R. 7852, proposing the National Securities Act of 1934, in the following particulars:

This is what a member of the association has to say about this statement:

I am wondering if the association has the right to undertake to express itself on behalf of all its members in this way without their consent.

I am not ready to say, for example, that the National Securities Act of 1934 is the dangerous instrument that the association's statement would have one believe it to be. . . . I have had an accurate account at one of the brokers for many years so that I am not speaking unfamiliar with the stock market.

Of all letters examined about 350 represent forms which have been followed word for word, and another 200 are obviously based on a given model, although not absolutely identical.

This sort of thing is particularly insidious when carried on under the veil of governmental authority. An example turned up the other day: When questioned by the Scripps-Howard press, Mr. George Houston, the actual head of the so-called "durable goods committee of the code authorities under the N.R.A.," admitted that a formal memorandum of proposed changes in the bill to satisfy business, presented to me as the official work of the committee, was at least physically mimeographed at 2 o'clock in the morning on the machines of the New York Stock Exchange lobby in the suite of Mr. Whitney's lawyers in the Willard Hotel.

The business man who brought me the memorandum as the work of the committee—a perfectly honest man whose sincerity I thoroughly trust—freely admitted after the exposure that he had been "played for a sucker." The National Manufacturers Association and its own lobby here in Washington were clearly implicated in the preparation of the memorandum under these circumstances. We have had all sorts of reports from N.R.A. committees in the last couple of months about the Securities Act and similar legislation. I wonder how many of the reports of such committees and how many reports of chambers of commerce, business bureaus, and national associations of this and that have resulted in 2-o'clock-in-the-morning visits to the Willard Hotel or similar sources of disinterested advice to the public. I am sorry that more of the press did not carry General Johnson's highly significant statement after the durable goods committee incident in which he openly repudiated any authority of that or similar committees to speak for the N.R.A. And yet in the letters coming to the President are clear references to the effect of that report of the durable goods committee on an unsuspecting business public. I have offered you just a few illustrative concrete instances of activity which we have felt going on about us. Of themselves, if they were all, they might be comparatively unimportant. But they are very important not for what they are but for what they lead us to suspect as indications of the kind of thing which a thousand times multiplied has been going on invisibly around us.

The blunt fact about the reaction of that portion of the public which has been induced by this campaign to protest against the bill—particularly that part of the business public which is excited about the regimentation of industry supposed to lurk in the bill—is that it has either been unable to comprehend the necessarily complicated provisions of this long bill and the many drafts of it which have followed one another in the course of its revision, or that it has simply swallowed the opinions of propagandists whole without reading what they are supposed to be talking about.

I tell you from my own experience at the center of all this agitation that that part of the public which has been used by the New York Stock Exchange in its propaganda to create an appearance of a furore of protest against this bill is not representative of anything but the smallest portion of the public as a whole—and the public as a whole, perfectly conscious of the propaganda, are watching with interest to see whether we succumb to it. For every frightened security holder and every brokerage-house clerk and every nervous corporation executive who has let the stock exchange do this thinking for him, there are thousands whom experience with securities has made hard-headed who are doing some thinking for themselves, and are watching to see whether Congress hesitates to regulate the great financial powers of Wall Street whom tradition says cannot be controlled by the forces of Government.

One of the things that has been most frequently used to frighten people, particularly business men, are the provisions of the bill that have to do with reporting by corporations. When, for example, the business man whom I have referred to as admitting to me that he had been "played as a sucker", came to me with the memorandum mimeographed at the Washington headquarters of the New York Stock Exchange, I told him that I would take the bill and sit down with him and if there was a line in the bill or a sentence that did an injustice to or put an unreasonable burden upon business in this country I would be the first to move to strike it out. I then took the bill up and said to this gentleman, "Your first amendment is to strike out section 2 of the bill entirely. Why do you want to strike that out? It simply declares that this matter has reached the point where it is charged with a public interest, that there is necessity for regulation." He then said that he did not care whether it was stricken out or not, but I said, "You move to strike it out."

At every place in the bill where the term "or appropriate in the public interest" occurs, they have proposed to strike it out. Just why should a statement like that be objectionable? If the Commission that administers this law must find, before it can reach a rule or regulation, that it is in the public interest or for the interest of the investing public, what objection is there to that? It seems to me that that is a loosening of the bill. But that gets back to another thing. This bill now is criticized because it gives too much power to the administrative authorities, but all through the hearings the representatives of the exchanges and the so-called "representatives of business" in this country pounded into the committee the unwisdom of particularizing in the legislation, or going further than simply fixing the outstanding standards for the administrative body to go by. We went through the bill, and everywhere that we could find a place to give authority to the Commission to make rules and regulations to govern these matters we gave it to them, and now you will hear throughout this House those who are not voting against the bill but voting for every amendment which pulls the teeth of it, saying that they fear that we are giving to a commission or board here in Washington unheard-of powers to look into the affairs of business.

Mr. Chairman, there is no use trying to write a bill that will be effective, which will cure these evils, that will protect the public in general and investors in particular, which will please also the great exchanges of this country. These stock exchange amendments were offered in the committee. We were able to vote them down. They will be offered on the floor of this House, and I intend to brand every one of them as they come. Some people in this country may want the New York Stock Exchange and its satellites and hirelings to write this legislation. I do not. [Applause.] I do want to write a bill that will deal justly and fairly with every group and with every individual in this land. I have been held up I know as an enemy to business, but there is nothing in my career in Congress that warrants it. Twenty-four months ago I was called one of the arch reactionaries of the House and of the country, but when I went out with the securities' bill and tried to protect the investing public in this country by giving them information about securities that were offered to them, and stopping a lot of pretty bad practices that were going on, I was then advertised as a radical or a bolshevik. When I came along following the recommendation of the President of the United States and the platform upon which he was elected and upon which each and every one of you on my right was elected, trying to carry out this legislation in the protection of the people against the rapacities of the past, I am again branded as one who is willing to go out and destroy business.

Let me tell you something, and I say this to representatives of the exchanges who are doing me the honor to sit in the galleries this afternoon. They have not yet lost hope that they will be able to pull the teeth of this bill so they are still around here, and I am glad to have them here.

They are engaged in a business that ought to go on, that has a very legitimate and important function to perform. We should have a market place for the exchange of securities, but it should be a clean and honest market place.

They are in a business that, since 1929, has not stood in such high favor in the United States. In their own selfish interest, if their judgment was used, instead of their fear, they would want a strong bill for the regulation of the exchanges in order to reestablish the faith and confidence of the people so that they will again in the future, if they forget their unhappy experience of the past, use these exchanges as a place of barter and trade for securities.

Then I took up sections 11 and 12 of this bill with this business man, and I said to him, "if you will point out one thing in sections 11 and 12", and that is the registration requirements for securities, "one line that regiments business, that interferes with the operation of your own business, that makes it unduly burdensome, I will take it out." I sat down with him, and I began to read these things to him. What are they supposed to do? When they try to scare you about what the Commission is asking them to do, let me show you what the committee on stock list of the New York Stock Exchange asks them to do and the questions which they ask them to answer. Here I hold in my hand the printed list of requirements; observe all those questions covering several pages, which must be answered. The New York Curb Exchange also has detailed requirements. Now, what do we ask them to report? You know there is a remarkable thing about this bill. It contained a provision that they should report to the stock exchange and to the Commission. They objected to reporting to the Commission. Why I was never able to figure out; but they were perfectly willing that a copy of the report that they made to the stock exchange, when they had an application for a listing of their securities, should be filed with the Commission. What the difference is in that I do not know, but we did put in the bill a provision that they should file the original with the stock exchange and a duplicate with the Commission if the Commission asked them to do it.

Now, what do we ask them to do?

(A) The organization, financial structure, and nature of business.

Is that harmful? Is that irksome?

(B) The terms, position, rights, and privileges of the different classes of securities outstanding.

(C) The terms on which their securities are to be, and during the preceding 3 years have been, offered to the public or otherwise.

(D) The directors and officers, their remuneration (including amounts paid, or which may become payable, as a bonus or under a profit-sharing agreement), and their interests in the securities of, and their material contracts with, the issuer and any person directly or indirectly controlling or controlled by, or under direct or indirect common control with, the issuer.

Is it asking too much that they give us their bonus lists? I think, my friends, that when an officer of a company is paid a salary sufficient unto his labor, then if the company happens to make profits, those profits are the property of the stockholders. I think it is a very bad thing not only from the standpoint of what I think is the right thing to do but also from the standpoint of the very looks of things for a man to receive $150,000 a year as a salary and eight or nine hundred thousand dollars at the end of the year as a bonus.

It appears to me that if a man is paid from $75,000 to $150,000 a year, he is reasonably compensated; and if not he alone but all of the people in the organization and all the people that labor to produce what it sells should make $900,000, it either ought to be distributed to the stockholders or among those who made it possible. We ask merely that the stockholders be informed of the bonuses. If that is regimentation of business, then that is it.

Then we ask for:

Remuneration (including amounts paid, or which may become payable, as a bonus or under a profit-sharing agreement) in excess of $10,000 per annum, to any person other than directors and officers.

(F) Management and service contracts of material importance to investors;

(G) Options existing or to be created with respect to their securities;

(H) Balance sheets for the 3 preceding years certified by independent public accountants or otherwise, as the Commission may prescribe; and

(I) Profit-and-loss statements for the 3 preceding years, certified by independent public accountants or otherwise, as the Commission may prescribe.

Such copies of articles of incorporation, bylaws, trust indentures, or corresponding documents by whatever name known, underwriting arrangements, and other similar documents.

And so forth.

Now, I want to say that before a man can list his stock on the New York Stock Exchange, he may be required to file that much or more (apart from the disclosure of bonuses, which certainly the investing public has a right to know), but there seems to be a fear running around that the Government is going to regiment business. If any gentleman on the floor of this House during the consideration of this bill—and we have had all of these amendments—can demonstrate to the membership of this committee on either side of the House that there is regimentation of business in this bill, we are willing to take it out.

Now, the talk has been that they would have uniform accounting for all corporations of the country. There is nothing like that in this bill. There is no attempt to do it, but if an agency of the Government is going to try to regulate the sale or dealing in securities of any corporation doing business in interstate commerce, there must be intelligent reporting so that somebody can understand it.

I asked some of our railroad brethren years ago, when we were trying to get them to bring about a system of uniform accounting, which we afterward had to pass a law to make them do, why they did not get up figures that somebody could understand. It took a Philadelphia lawyer to understand their figures. Finally, by act of Congress, they were forced to bring about a uniform system of accounting, which they fought very strenuously, and today each railroad will tell you that they themselves would oppose the repeal of that requirement.

I do not say that the average business in the country is on the same footing with the railroads, because the railroads are strictly a regimented industry, being public-service corporations and subject in all of their dealings to the law.

I do challenge these people to show me where there is any interference, but they cannot show it. This fear went out from Washington. Propaganda was spread throughout the land. It went to every manufacturer; it went to every bank; it went to every employee of these houses throughout the country, a campaign of misrepresentation and attempted fright.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief interruption at this point?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am quoting from the report of the New York Stock Exchange for the year 1931-32, written by Mr. Whitney himself. In it this statement is made:

The exchange is a firm believer in the necessity of full and complete statistics about corporate affairs. It has for many years urged companies to give practical and complete information to shareholders about all aspects of company business.

Mr. RAYBURN. I agree with that statement. The president of the exchange also said in an address last year before the Chamber of Commerce of Cleveland:

In the nineteenth century even large businesses which had grown out of family enterprises were still controlled or at least influenced by the judgment of a few stockholders who held a substantial interest in the company and who were active in its affairs. Today that is the exception rather than the rule. I do not believe that as a result of this change the officials who have been operating our great corporations are less efficient than those who would have been chosen under the old order of things. I believe quite the contrary. But a vastly important consequence of this change is the fact that the published reports of our great companies are now the only authoritative information upon which investors can judge of the success or failure of the companies in which they have put their money. In the past, when there were few stockholders and these few were actively interested in the business of the company, the amount of information published by American companies was meager, and it became an almost invariable habit to set up company accounts in the most simple form of a balance sheet and income account. In many instances these financial statements were far from informative, and, indeed, practically no effort was made to state in them facts of the utmost importance. I shall not attempt to go into a technical discussion of accounting principles, but I can illustrate what I mean by a very simple example. Many industrial enterprises necessarily have on hand at all times inventories of either finished goods or raw materials. If these inventories are valued simply at the amount paid for them, the condition of the company often appears to be better or worse than it is in reality. It is only in recent years that the necessity of valuing inventories at or below market value has been generally recognized, and until this principle is applied universally, there is always the chance that company statements may mislead investors rather than inform them. There are many similar situations in accounting practice due to the fact, already mentioned, that some of our generally accepted methods of accounting were established by companies owned and operated by a few stockholders. These methods are not adequate to inform the investors of today who are obliged to rely almost entirely for their information upon financial statements sent to them by their companies.

It is now generally recognized that the lack of complete disclosure of the results of business operations contributed to the inflation of security values which preceded the panic of 1929. More frank and more complete information might have prevented many people from assuming that profitable operation would continue indefinitely. Investors were satisfied if it appeared that their company had earned more in the current year than in the preceding period and were induced by that information alone to hope that the future would show nothing but increasing profits. Had they known that in some instances a large part of these profits was due to nonrecurring and fortuitous circumstances, and in others to the use of accounting methods which resulted in an overstatement of income, they might have been less optimistic and security prices might not have become so inflated.

The public today insists upon more complete and accurate financial statements from publicly owned companies and I am sure that the officials and directors of these corporations, realizing the reasonableness of this demand, will furnish investors with adequate information. There have not been many instances where the failure to give complete information was due to a desire on the part of directors or officers to secure unfair personal advantage. However, many company officials did not publish complete financial statements because they were afraid that the disclosure of too much information would put their companies at a disadvantage in meeting competition, not only from other American corporations, but frequently from foreign companies engaged in the same line of business. This fear, though genuine, has in large measure proved to be unfounded.

And it is to the credit of the New York Stock Exchange that within the limits of its power it has done a great deal to require more and more information for the benefit of stockholders.

"Why then", say opponents of the bill, "is not the problem of reports of corporation left to the exchanges without Government interference?" One answer is that the exchanges are not in a position as a practical matter to require issuing corporations to give them as much information as modern standards consider is indispensably necessary to aid decent appraisal by an investor of the value of a security he proposes to buy or sell. Exchanges can only go so far before selfish managements and interlocking banking control decide that it is more advisable to fight the exchanges' requirements than to tell shareholders the entire truth about the use of their money. Another reason is that when the amount of information which is to be furnished depends upon the power of exchanges to enforce requirements as a matter of private contract in return for the advantages of listing, the trading positions of exchanges vary greatly. Requirements which the great New York Stock Exchange can insist upon, smaller exchanges cannot insist upon and get enough business to live. Writing minimum listing requirements for all listed corporations into sections 11 and 12 assures a decent minimum of listing requirements for securities listed on all exchanges, and having the information filed not only with the exchanges, but with a Federal agency, assures that the information will really be available and readily accessible to investors who might have difficulty approaching the exchanges.

The information asked for by sections 11 and 12 goes no further than the present requirements of the New York Stock Exchange except in respect of the revelation of the remuneration of officers, directors, and high-salaried employees. As a legal matter, the New York Stock Exchange can demand far more than is required by sections 11 and 12 since there is no limit to what, by private contract, the exchange can demand of applicants. It requires as part of its listing agreement that the applicant "furnish the New York Stock Exchange, on demand, such reasonable information concerning the company as may be required." Companies that are subject to such demands upon them on the part of private interest operating a public-securities market, can hardly be heard to object to the minimum listing requirements set forth in sections 11 and 12.

As for the new requirements set out in sections 11 and 12 for the revelation of the compensation and remuneration which officers, directors, and high-salaried employees take out of the business, that is an advance which the public investors of the United States who are paying that compensation and remuneration will demand regardless of the protests of the managements whom they are paying and the charges that such revelation may interfere with essential secrecy in the operation of corporations.

Now, coming back to this campaign of fear, the President of the United States wrote me a letter before he went away on a short vacation, in which he called attention to this propaganda and pointed out that it came from a common source; and, of course, it was paid for from a common source. I, too, can bear witness to this organized propaganda. I have in my hands a batch of more than 200 letters. As you may observe, they came from a common source, from the same neighborhood. Every one is in the same colored envelope, but they are written in different hands.

As I pointed out before, the Associated Gas & Electric System is circularizing everybody who owns any of its stock. While it may not be information to you, it is true nevertheless, that the Associated Gas & Electric System throughout its existence—and it is a concern whose securities run into hundreds of millions of dollars—has been the most noncooperative organization in the United States, both with regard to State commissions and to legislative bodies. This system, of course, is dominated by the personality of Mr. Hobson; and he is pretty hard to get before a committee, as some of you may know.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The objections of most of the utilities were met by an amendment accepted by the committee, which amendment inserted the words "or any State." I think this was the principal objection from the utility companies.

Mr. RAYBURN. Of course, we put the language in the bill "of any State"; but we also provided that the commission should be allowed to call for other things, because we know some of the States do not have any laws with reference to this question and some have very poor laws with respect to it.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If I may make this further observation, the fear expressed by the utilities was that they would have to set up a double-accounting system. They now have to conform to a system set up by each State public utility commission; and the thing about which they complained in the bill in its original form was that it would probably cause them to set up a double-accounting system.

Mr. RAYBURN. The requirement that adequate and intelligent reports be made for the benefit of investors does not necessitate the keeping of two sets of books.

Remember that we have been hearing for these 2 months on this subject of corporate reports only the voice of corporation managements. We have heard very little on behalf of the great unorganized and inarticulate mass of millions of security holders, who look to us to understand their side of the problem without a lobby. But three indications of their side of the problem have been presented in the course of the hearings that I think should be known. Two of them are communications from great investment services that for many years have tried to make available to the great investing public knowledge of the value of corporate securities—Standard Statistics Service and Moody's Investment Service. The following excerpt appeared in the Standard Trade and Securities Service of Standard Statistics Service on April 7:

IMPROVED CORPORATION STATEMENTS

The section of the proposed act dealing with the adequacy, frequency, and uniformity of corporation reports is, in our judgment, a prudent one.

To most of the large corporations the securities of which are now listed on national exchanges, the supervision over corporation reports that is provided for will constitute not much more than a mere technicality. These corporations are already, in the main, rendering adequate reports to their security owners of sufficient frequency and in sufficient detail.

On the other hand, there still exist, unhappily, a limited number of corporations which have invited the investing public to advance loans to them, or to join in partnership with them, but which still refuse to render the proper kind of financial reports to the public. Indeed, a limited number of cases can be cited where there are securities in the hands of the public but where the corporations which issued these securities refuse to give any financial information whatsoever to security owners.

From the standpoint of the investing public, such an attitude appeals to us as entirely indefensible.

In sum, this portion of the act is quite unlikely to work any hardship upon those thousands of corporations which are already playing fair with their security owners. It does, however, compel necessary publicity on the part of that relatively small group which has not been playing fair.

There is every reason to believe that the Federal Trade Commission, in administering this section of the act, will not be unduly severe.

The following is a letter I received from Moody's, one of the oldest investment services in the United States:

APRIL 10, 1934.

HON. SAM RAYBURN,
House of Representatives Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

Re: Revised National Securities Exchange Act of 1934.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: We have noted, from press reports, that some amendments are being offered and made in the above bill.

We write to express the hope that those sections which require issuing corporations to make available to the public information on registered securities will not be weakened. We refer to section 11 (b) and to section 12.

In urging that there be no amendments to these sections such as would materially affect them, we speak as an organization that has been for more than 30 years engaged in furnishing information and counsel to institutions and individual investors.

In our experience there is no room for doubt that the more information there is available concerning a corporation, the more accurate one's judgment can be as to the investment qualifications of its securities. Or, to put it in the opposite way, lack of adequate and frequent information concerning a corporation prevents effectively thorough appraisal of the investment qualifications of its securities.

We do not wish to argue that availability of information will ipso facto protect investors against losses. Intelligence cannot, of course, be legislated into investors' minds. But exercise of intelligence, where it does exist, can be made possible if adequate information be made available as set forth in the above-mentioned sections of the bill. This would also tend to prevent a certain amount of that type of market manipulation which is based on absence of information.

Yours very truly,

RUSSELL LEAVITT, Vice President.

And one of the few witnesses who appeared on the investors' side of this problem, the manager of a great investment trust in New York City, a professional investor of the public's money and a professional analyst for that purpose of corporation reports, made a statement in part as follows:

If by the term "trade secrets", opponents of this measure mean excessive margins of profit, which would be revealed only by the publication of earnings against sales, then these critics have cited the best reason for publication of the figures.

If margins of profit are too wide and prices are too high, the consuming public should be afforded the protection of open competition and investors should be apprised that the margins are so wide as to become untenable through competition.

Some directors and executives of corporations have failed to keep pace with the progressive transfer of control from private groups to the public. The directors today are merely employees working in the interest of the investing public. The latter never intended to place the directors in a preferential position with regard to information concerning the company's earnings, but this situation exists in hundreds of companies today.

Pool operations in recent years have been concentrated largely in stocks of companies which report annually and which thus preserve secrecy and mystery concerning their earnings for months at a time.

A study of hundreds of companies in the last 7 years has convinced me that the units which do not report adequately on their operations and financial status have either been losing ground competitively, have been pursuing policies which they do not care to have exposed, have been operating on margins of profit which are clearly excessive, or have been influenced in their public relations by private groups, which have not yet recognized the shifting of ownership of great corporations to the public and are not sensitive to the fiduciary responsibilities of directors and officers.

The reporting of large corporations has improved in recent years, partly as a result of the leadership of the New York Stock Exchange, and because of the increasing recognition of the rights of the smaller investor, which has been produced by the recent depression.

If the corporate form of organization is to endure, millions of investors must be protected by legislation that will ensure that the small stockholder and the large one will be treated on a basis of equality.

The major problem of investors and investment trusts is the appraising of values. Whenever the financial community has gotten too far away from values and loses its perspective, as in 1929 and the summer of 1933, there has been trouble.

The problem of appraising values depends on three factors: General business conditions, on which Government agencies, such as the Federal Reserve Board and the Department of Commerce, present full information; the condition of the industry in which one is seeking to invest funds; and the financial record of the individual companies. The success of the investor in ascertaining facts regarding industries and individual companies is dependent largely on the policy of companies as to issuing adequate and frequent reports.

I do not believe that any company would have the effrontery to seek to evade the reporting requirements of this bill by withdrawing its shares from listing on any exchange in this country.

These, then, are the reasons why provisions for decent and frequent corporate reports are included in this stock exchange bill. They simply standardize requirements which the stock exchanges are already making at a standard which offers at least a beginning of protection against the concealment of management interests of investors who have hitherto bought into listed securities almost entirely blindly.

A lot has been said to the effect that this bill would cause deflation of outstanding securities. I think Governor Black of the Federal Reserve Board is the best authority on this question. Governor Black was asked the direct question if he thought it would bring about a deflation of securities and he said:

I have heard "wolf" cried so much about business in this country that I do not have much fear about it. We heard the same thing when we went off of the gold standard; you heard the same thing about the gold clause, and I felt the same way when they took our gold, but I was mistaken in all three things.

Governor Black was asked what effect a similar law would have had upon the situation in 1929 and he said that nothing could have stopped the wild speculation of 1929 because the people practically went insane; but he did say that if such a law had been in effect in 1927 and 1928 preceding the break in New York, that it could have been materially lessened. That is what he says about these so-called "deflationary provisions."

In section 3 of the bill we set forth the definitions; and I shall insert in the RECORD at this point some further definitions of terms which may be used in connection with the discussions of the bill in nontechnical language and are only intended to assist the Members in understanding the bill.

A "put" is an option to sell a security at a given price within a given time.

A "call" is an option to buy a security at a given price within a given time.

A "straddle" is a combination of a "put" and a "call", giving the holder the right either to sell or to buy the security at specified prices within a given time.

The term "pool" is used to describe operations to control the price of a security, usually by means of a syndicate or joint account. Under the bill all efforts to raise or lower the price of a security are outlawed. Pools to peg or stabilize the price are subject to regulation by the Commission.

A "short sale" is a sale by a person who does not own the security sold. He borrows the security to make delivery to the buyer and subsequently buys the security in order to return it to the lender. His profit is the difference between the price at which he sells and that at which he subsequently buys.

"Floor trading" is trading on the premises of an exchange by members for their own account. As used in the bill it also includes trading for a discretionary account.

"Arbitrage" is the simultaneous buying of a security in one market at a price and selling it in another market at another price for the purpose of profiting from the difference in prices in such markets.

"Over-the-counter market", as used in this bill, refers to a market maintained off a regular exchange by one or more dealers or brokers. The market must be maintained both for the purchase and the sale of the securities in question. A dealer or broker who merely undertakes a request to find a purchaser for a person who wants to sell or to find a seller for a person who wants to buy, would not usually be considered to be creating a market. But the dealer who normally is willing to quote "a market", that is, both the price at which he will buy and the price at which he will sell, is creating an over-the-counter market.

Section 6 is the section around which a great controversy has raged. It deals with the all-important problem of credit control or margins. I have from the beginning considered this problem paramount. A reasonably high margin requirement is essential so that a person cannot get in the market on a shoe string one day and be one of the sheared lambs when he wakes up the next morning. I do not believe people ought to be allowed to go into the market on a 10-, 15-, 20-, or 25-percent margin.

Originally we proposed in this bill that the margin should be 60 percent for the initial margin or 40 percent as the initial loan. Then in order to bring about an agreement, I proposed 50 percent for margins and 50 percent for loan values. The subcommittee finally went to an initial margin of 45 percent and a borrowing of 55 percent, which the full committee accepted. And considerable flexibility in the application of the margin rules is afforded by the provision permitting a broker to lend 100 percent of the 3-year low, not exceeding 75 percent of the market. Indeed, according to the calculations of Standard Statistics, the margins required on the basis of the present level of the market would not exceed 35 percent.

Governor Black has been quoted all around as wanting this bill flexible as far as margins are concerned. A proposal was made from some source that we have a marginal requirement in the bill, but that no standard should be set up and that the margin business should be turned over entirely to the administrative body. May I say one thing about these margins? It matters not whether this bill is administered by a board or a commission and the Federal Reserve Board in conjunction with them, but it is important that the margin requirements for member banks of the Federal Reserve System, the margin requirements for nonmember banks, and the margin requirements for brokers be put under the administration of the same body. If the margins for the member banks are under the Federal Reserve System, then the margins for the nonmember banks and for the brokers should be handled by the same agency.

As Governor Black said, whether or not there was a standard fixed in the bill the margin requirements should be administered by the same body for the reason that if the Federal Reserve Board fixed one marginal requirement for member banks and another administrative authority fixed another margin for brokers and nonmember banks, speculative loans would move from the brokers and nonmember banks to member banks, or from member banks to the brokers and nonmember banks, depending upon which margin requirements were the higher.

But believing that we should set up a flag somewhere, and that we should give some congressional expression to what we regarded as a proper margin requirement, we set up 45 percent as the initial margin, and yet we give the Federal Reserve Board, when it finds it in the public interest, and necessary to the free flow of trade and commerce, power to vary even the 45-percent margin for initial opening of accounts. Not only that, but we go farther and say that the maintenance of the account shall be left entirely with the administrative body. It seemed to those of us who believe in some sort of a standard being fixed by Congress, some kind of a bright line drawn or signal set up, that we would have failed in our duty if we did not give some indication to the Reserve Board as to what we regarded as a fair minimum-margin requirement.

I believe that the House, after discussion and when we begin to read this bill under the 5-minute rule, will come to the same conclusion that the subcommittee and the full committee came to, namely, that we should have a marginal requirement in this bill.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. Assume a man employed by a company whose stock is dealt with on an exchange. If that man wants to buy further of his company's stock and goes to the banker to make a loan in order to increase his stock holdings, does this bill limit his banker as to the amount of money the banker may lend him to buy his company's stock?

Mr. RAYBURN. If it is listed on the exchange, yes.

Mr. CLAIBORNE. So that young men who have built themselves up by buying their company's stock, of which they know much, are limited in the future and may not be able to do so?

Mr. RAYBURN. They will unless by rules and regulations it is provided otherwise, if the stock is listed on the New York exchange.

If there has been a thing in the world that has been abused throughout this country, and if there is one way in which management perpetuates itself in office, it is by the use of proxies. We treat that situation here and say that the proxies shall be used under such rules and regulations as the administrative body may promulgate.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. I wanted to inquire about the other provision. May I ask the gentleman whether or not his committee considered the question of taking stockbrokers or members of the exchange out of the banking business and forbidding them lending money to their customers, and compelling the customers to either have the cash or go to the banks and get it? Did the committee consider that question?

Mr. RAYBURN. The rules and regulations give wide authority to the administrative body over loans. Stock-exchange brokers cannot lend on unlisted securities, but banks may lend any amount they deem proper.

Mr. McFADDEN. There is no restriction on the brokers borrowing money from the banks and in turn lending to their customers.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is precisely what the margin regulations cover.

We have a liability clause in here covering false and misleading statements. It appeared to us that there ought to be some way of protecting a man against false and misleading statements.

The first provision of the bill as originally written was very much challenged on the ground that reliance should be required. This objection has been met. In other words, if a man bought a security following a prospectus that carried a false or misleading statement, he could not recover from the man who sold to him, nor could the seller be punished criminally, unless the buyer bought the security with knowledge of the statement and relied upon the statement. It seemed to us that this is as little as we could do.

I will proceed to section 18, which deals with powers with respect to exchanges and securities. The Commission is authorized, if in its opinion such action is necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors, after appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing, by order, to suspend not only an exchange for a period but to suspend trading in a security on an exchange. In other words, they may force the delisting of the security if the issuer of such security has failed to comply with any provision or the rules and regulations thereunder.

May I say something about the hearings before the Commission? The hearings may be public. There are some issues which will come before the Commission where the people who are being heard would not want open hearings, because it might give away trade secrets that they would not want given out. We have protected in this bill, as far as language can protect, the trade secrets of corporations.

We come to the penalty clause of the bill, which was very drastic in the beginning. The maximum penalty for violation was 10 years' imprisonment, a $25,000 fine, or both.

Of course, I did not think it made a great deal of difference, since this was the maximum penalty and the court could impose such fine or imprisonment as it deemed appropriate to the particular offense. But to show that the committee wanted to take as much of this so-called "fright" out of the bill as possible, we reduced the maximum penalty to a fine of $10,000 or 2 years in prison, and in the case of an exchange, to a fine of not more than $500,000.

All in all, as we believe we will be able to demonstrate under the 5-minute rule in answer to questions and in the discussion of amendments, we have a reasonable bill, one that will not be irksome to any legitimate industry, but will protect the public from conditions that have existed in the past and in the long run will not only help investors and the public in general, but will be a great boon to the stock exchanges themselves and the traders on the stock exchanges.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I am very much in favor of regulating the stock exchanges and have a great deal of confidence in the information of the chairman of this committee, but I would like to state a concrete proposition that affects my own particular neighborhood and see if it meets the requirements of this legislation. In my district I have an operating coal company that is a $30,000,000 concern with a $6,000,000 defaulted bond issue in receivership. I have another coal company that has a statement involving $8,000,000 with a $35,000,000 bond issue in default and it is also in receivership. I have a gas company that owns a good many leases of gas wells in production and has a default of $4,500,000 of bonds. Under the provisions of this proposed legislation, could these receivers enter into an agreement with the bondholders by which they could refund these bonds by an issue of preferred or common stock, without having to meet the requirements of this legislation? In other words, would they have to list these stocks on the exchanges?

Mr. RAYBURN. If they are not listed stocks, they would not have to do it.

Mr. MAY. If they are not already listed stocks?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; primarily this does not have anything to do with securities except those listed on a national exchange, and the exchange must make application and be granted the right to register them before it comes under the National Securities Act. The commission also has power to regulate the over-the-counter markets, but in so doing they can only regulate the brokers or dealers who create a public market for both the purchase and sale of such securities, and cannot compel corporations not interested in having a public market for their shares to file any statements or submit to any regulation.

Mr. MAY. Then it would not affect small corporations at all who have not such registered stocks?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit, the company that the gentleman from Kentucky is speaking of would be affected by this legislation and, as a matter of fact, it ought to be affected, because before they offer such a security to the gullible public, such as the securities of a company that has been in receivership, the public ought to be protected by some sort of law.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the Securities Act of 1933 is the one to which the gentleman is referring.

Mr. MAY. My question does not have any reference to the gullible public. I am talking about the bondholders of the concern taking stock for it.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Is not this company listed on the New York Stock Exchange?

Mr. MAY. I do not know whether it is or not, but it is a New York corporation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to close, because I am fearfully tired and I would rather answer the questions you are going to ask me under the 5-minute rule, because we are going to have unlimited debate at that time.

I want to wind up what I say here today by repeating what I stated in a radio address when I told the people of the country something about this bill.

The people of this country, I think, are high-minded and honest. I think the vast majority of business in this country is high-minded and honest. I do not think we have to pass restrictive laws for a great deal of business, but I do think that business with a reputation to protect, that over a long period of years has built up a reputation and a good will among the people that is worth a great deal to it, has the right to be protected from the desperadoes who are making it hard on the man who wants to conduct a straightforward and honest business.

I think the people of this country want corruption driven from high places. I think they want and expect their public officials to be clean, and we must not forget, when we are harassed by this propaganda of a few thousands of people, the unnumbered millions throughout this country who have not been articulate in this fight, who have no interests to serve except the common good. They are looking to you and to me as their spokesmen and as their Representatives, not only now but in the future. They want to see this country clean in business and clean in politics, so that the faith and confidence of our people may not be shattered and destroyed, so that under a faith and confidence that are constant and patriotic the institutions of this country, great as they are, may be transmitted to posterity in such a way that those who live at that time can be of the most service to those who live about them. [Applause.] I thank you.

Since the majority report of the committee deals more fully with matters that I have had time only to touch upon, I insert it as part of my remarks.

The report is as follows:

[H.Rept. No. 1383, 73d Cong., 2d sess.]

SECURITIES EXCHANGE BILL OF 1934

Mr. RAYBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, submitted the following report to accompany H.R. 9323:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, report favorably thereon without amendment, and recommend that the bill do pass.

I. INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE AND LETTER

On February 9, 1934, the President sent the following message to Congress:

"To the Congress:

"In my message to you last March proposing legislation for Federal supervision of national traffic in investment securities I said: 'This is but one step in our broad purpose of protecting investors and depositors. It should be followed by legislation relating to the better supervision of the purchase and sale of all property dealt with on exchanges.'

"This Congress has performed a useful service in regulating the investment business on the part of financial houses and in protecting the investing public in its acquisition of securities.

"There remains the fact, however, that outside the field of legitimate investment naked speculation has been made far too alluring and far too easy for those who could and for those who could not afford to gamble.

"Such speculation has run the scale from the individual who has risked his pay envelop or his meager savings on a margin transaction involving stocks with whose true value he was wholly unfamiliar, to the pool of individuals or corporations with large resources, often not their own, which sought by manipulation to raise or depress market quotations far out of line with reason, all of this resulting in loss to the average investor, who is of necessity personally uninformed.

"The exchanges in many parts of the country which deal in securities and commodities conduct, of course, a national business, because their customers live in every part of the country. The managers of these exchanges have, it is true, often taken steps to correct certain obvious abuses. We must be certain that abuses are eliminated, and to this end a broad policy of national regulation is required.

"It is my belief that exchanges for dealing in securities and commodities are necessary and of definite value to our commercial and agricultural life. Nevertheless, it should be our national policy to restrict, as far as possible, the use of these exchanges for purely speculative operations.

"I, therefore, recommend to the Congress the enactment of legislation providing for the regulation by the Federal Government of the operations of exchanges dealing in securities and commodities for the protection of investors, for the safeguarding of values, and, so far as it may be possible, for the elimination of unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

"THE WHITE HOUSE, February 9, 1934."

On March 26, 1934, the President sent the following letter to the chairman of this committee:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 26, 1934.

HON. SAM RAYBURN,
Chairman Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Before I leave Washington for a few days' holiday, I want to write you about a matter which gives me some concern.

On February 9, 1934, I sent to the Congress a special message asking for Federal supervision of national traffic in securities.

It has come to my attention that a more definite and more highly organized drive is being made against effective legislation to this end than against any similar recommendation made by me during the past year. Letters and telegrams bearing all the earmarks of origin at some common source are pouring in to the White House and the Congress.

The people of this country are, in overwhelming majority, fully aware of the fact that unregulated speculation in securities and in commodities was one of the most important contributing factors in the artificial and unwarranted "boom" which had so much to do with the terrible conditions of the years following 1929.

I have been definitely committed to definite regulation of exchanges which deal in securities and commodities. In my message I stated, "it should be our national policy to restrict, as far as possible, the use of these exchanges for purely speculative operations."

I am certain that the country as a whole will not be satisfied with legislation unless such legislation has teeth in it. The two principal objectives are, as I see it—

First, the requirement of what is known as margins so high that speculation, even as it exists today, will of necessity be drastically curtailed; and

Second, that the Government be given such definite powers of supervision over exchanges that the Government itself will be able to correct abuses which may arise in the future.

We must, of course, prevent insofar as possible manipulation of prices to the detriment of actual investors, but at the same time we must eliminate unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation.

The bill, as shown to me this afternoon by Senator FLETCHER, seems to meet the minimum requirements. I do not see how any of us could afford to have it weakened in any shape, manner, or form.

Very sincerely,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE GENERAL PURPOSES OF THE BILL

To reach the causes of the "unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation" condemned by the President's message, this bill seeks to regulate the stock exchanges and the relationships of the investing public to corporations which invite public investment by listing on such exchanges.

The bill is conceived in a spirit of the truest conservatism. It attempts to change the practices of exchanges and the relationships between listed corporations and the investing public to fit modern conditions, for the very purpose that they may endure as essential elements of our economic system. The lesson of 1921-29 is that without changes they cannot endure.

The bill is not a moral pose or a vengeful striking back at brokers for the losses which nearly the entire Nation has suffered in the last 5 years. Nor is its purpose or effect to regiment business in any way. It is simply an earnest attempt to make belated intelligent adjustments, long required by changing conditions, in a faulty system of distributing shares in corporate enterprise among the public—a system which from the coldly objective viewpoint of the welfare of a conservative public simply has not worked. The out-of-date unsuitability to post-war conditions of a whole series of economic interrelationships of which the stock exchanges are the nerve center has uncontrollably accentuated natural moderate fluctuations of our economic system into mad booms and terrible depressions. And such booms and depressions constitute a more real danger to the stability of a moderate, honest, individualistic state than all the unsound theories in the world. This bill seeks to save, not destroy, stock markets and business, by making necessary changes in time.

The fundamental fact behind the necessity for this bill is that the leaders of private business, whether because of inertia, pressure of vested interests, lack of organization, or otherwise, have not since the war been able to act to protect themselves by compelling a continuous and orderly program of change in methods and standards of doing business to match the degree to which the economic system has itself been constantly changing—changing in the proportion of the wealth of the Nation invested in liquid corporate securities traded in on the stock exchanges, changing in the relationship of the distribution of securities and the trading in securities to the balanced utilization of the Nation's credit resources in the financing of agriculture, commerce, and industry. The repetition in the summer of 1933 of the blindness and abuses of 1929 has convinced a patient public that enlightened self-interest in private leadership is not sufficiently powerful to effect the necessary changes alone—that private leadership seeking to make changes must be given Government help and protection.

Since the war the interest of the public at large in the ownership of corporate enterprise has grown bigger, the size of the corporate unit has increased, the diffusion of corporate ownership has widened, all correlatively. Not only is nearly one half of the entire national wealth of the country represented by corporate stocks and corporate and Government bonds, but nearly one half of that corporate wealth is vested in the 200 largest nonbanking corporations which, piercing the thin veil of the holding company and disregarding a relatively few notable exceptions, are owned in each case by thousands of investors and are controlled by those owning only a very small proportion of the corporate stock. Ownership and control are in most cases largely divorced. It is estimated that more than 10,000,000 individual men and women in the United States are the direct possessors of stocks and bonds; that over one fifth of all the corporate stock outstanding in the country is held by individuals with net incomes of less than $5,000 a year. Over 15,000,000 individuals hold insurance policies, the value of which is dependent upon the security holdings of insurance companies. Over 13,000,000 men and women have savings accounts in mutual savings banks and at least 25,000,000 have deposits in national and State banks and trust companies—which are in turn large holders of corporate stocks and bonds.

With this growth in security ownership by the public, the security markets have grown proportionately in importance. Two hundred and thirty-seven million corporate shares were sold on the New York Stock Exchange in 1923; despite the depression, 654,000,000 shares were sold in 1933.

With such concentration of national wealth in the form of liquid corporate securities, the economic machinery of the whole country is now affected by, and is organized primarily to serve, security markets which are as sensitive as a hair trigger. A magnificently organized lending machinery which operates by wire can, with an offer of call-loan safety and 1 percent higher interest, draw funds from local banks which would otherwise seek moderate investment in local business enterprise, to finance the pool of a far-away metropolitan speculator distributing through the stock exchanges the securities of a huge corporate merger designed ultimately to swallow and destroy local enterprise. And there is a demonstrable direct relationship between easy credit for the purchase of new securities in the stock market and the trend toward industrial monopolies so accentuated since the war.

A rise in the security markets stimulates economic activity in all lines of business, a fall in the market precipitates a decline. If the rise in the market is occasioned by an excessive use of credit, a decline in the market loosens a process of deflation which feeds on itself and ruins not only security prices but all business as well. Between 1922 and 1929 brokers' loans increased from 1½ billion dollars to 8½ billion dollars. Five billion dollars of this increase took place in 3 years, 1½ billion dollars in the last 3 months. In the crash of 1929 the same loans declined 3 billion dollars in the first 10 days and 8 billion in the next 3 years. These figures alone will enable the economic historian of the future to describe the unhealthy prosperity of 1929 and the inevitable grief and suffering that followed in the succeeding years—grief and suffering that overwhelmed and carried away not merely the speculative gains of those who participated in the speculative debauch, not merely the savings of the most frugal and most thrifty invested in securities, but eventually the operating profits of every business in the country no matter how unrelated to stock exchanges.

All through these years the machinery of the stock exchanges and of corporate management have only grown bigger without growing different. But this significant growth in size and importance of the exchanges and the business they do with the public has necessitated a real difference in kind in the treatment of that public by the law and by business ethics. Stock exchanges which handle the distribution and trading of a very substantial part of the entire national wealth and which have developed a technique of sucking funds from every corner of the country cannot operate under the same traditions and practices as pre-war stock exchanges which handled substantially only the transactions of professional investors and speculators. And standards of corporate management adequate to inspire investor confidence in the caveat-stockholder era of closely held stockholder-managed companies cannot be stably perpetuated in an era where one company boasts over 700,000 stockholders, and 200 corporations control one half the corporate wealth of the country.

If investor confidence is to come back to the benefit of exchanges and corporations alike, the law must advance. As a complex society so diffuses and differentiates the financial interests of the ordinary citizen that he has to trust others and cannot personally watch the managers of all his interests as one horse trader watches another, it becomes a condition of the very stability of that society that its rules of law and of business practice recognize and protect that ordinary citizen's dependent position. Unless constant extension of the legal conception of a fiduciary relationship—a guarantee of straight shooting—supports the constant extension of mutual confidence which is the foundation of a maturing and complicated economic system, easy liquidity of the resources in which wealth is invested is a danger rather than a prop to the stability of that system. When everything everyone owns can be sold at once, there must be confidence not to sell. Just in proportion as it becomes more liquid and complicated, an economic system must become more moderate, more honest, and more justifiably self-trusting.

When corporations were small, when their managers were intimately acquainted with their owners and when the interests of management and ownership were substantially identical, conditions did not require the regulations of security markers. Even those who in former days managed great corporations were by reason of their personal contacts with their shareholders constantly aware of their responsibilities. But as management became divorced from ownership and came under the control of banking groups, men forgot that they were dealing with the savings of men and the making of profits became an impersonal thing. When men do not know the victims of their aggression they are not always conscious of their wrongs. President Wilson showed a keen prophetic sense when he stated:

"Society cannot afford to have individuals wield the power of thousands without personal responsibility. It cannot afford to let its strongest men be the only men who are inaccessible to the law. Modern democratic society, in particular, cannot afford to constitute its economic undertakings upon the monarchical or aristocratic principle and adopt the fiction that the kings and great men thus set up can do no wrong which will make them personally amenable to the law which restrains smaller men; that their kingdom, not themselves, must suffer for their blindness, their follies, and their transgressions of right."

II. GENERAL ANALYSIS OF THE BILL

ITS SCOPE AND CONSTITUTIONALITY

The causes of dangerous speculation in the securities markets go far deeper than defects and abuses in stock-exchange machinery alone. They include inadequate central control of a national credit system that too easily provides for speculation funds which the national welfare much more requires in local commerce, industry, and agriculture. They include inadequate corporate reporting which keeps in ignorance of necessary factors for intelligent judgment of the values of securities a public continually solicited to buy such securities by the sheer advertising value of listing. They include exploitation of that ignorance by self-perpetuating managements in possession of inside information. Speculation, manipulation, faulty credit control, investors' ignorance, and disregard of trust relationships by those whom the law should regard as fiduciaries, are all a single seamless web. No one of these evils can be isolated for cure of itself alone. A stock-market pool, for instance, is only an effect and not a cause; the manipulator, a shell-game artist who can live only by following the county fair of too easy credit and ignorance.

A bill seeking effectively to control and regulate the securities markets therefore necessarily covers a wide field—necessarily touches more than a few willful speculators of Wall Street, necessarily calls for the cooperation of the wide-spread economic interests which the securities market affects. Business which was engulfed and nearly destroyed by the speculations of 1929 has its contribution to make in the form of fair and informing reports. Banks whose assets were carried away in loans based upon values inflated by reckless speculation must cooperate in permitting coordinated control of the delicate credit system which has been left to their management despite the fact that the Nation has had to expend billions of dollars to insure their solvency.

The factual situation which makes the legislation necessary is set forth in section 2. These recitals of fact—the use of the security markets as interstate markets in which ownership passes from residents of one State to those of another; the constant use of the postal facilities for the conduct of these markets; the abundant use of the credit facilities of national banks and of member banks of the Federal Reserve System; the effect of security prices upon transactions in interstate commerce, upon bank loans, upon taxes, and upon credit available for trade, transportation, and industry—are common knowledge not only among economists but among bankers and business men everywhere. This legislation is not an attempt to reach out and correct the morals of the citizens of any one State; it is an attempt to deal with very vital economic problems going to the root of the functioning of our national credit system.

The constitutional significance of the wide delegation of powers to the Federal Reserve Board and to the Federal Trade Commission, which would administer the act, has been considered with particular care—and the delegation made only with the indication of such maximum standards for discretion as, in the considered judgment of the committee, the technical character of the problems to be dealt with would permit. The bill legislates specifically just as far as the committee feels it can. The original bill submitted to the committee dealt very specifically and definitely with a number of admitted abuses. In many cases, however, the argument was made that while the solutions offered might be correct, their effects were so far-reaching as to make it inadvisable to put these solutions in the form of statutory enactments that could not be changed in case of need without Congressional action. Representatives of the stock exchanges constantly urged a greater degree of flexibility in the statute and insisted that the complicated nature of the problems justified leaving much greater latitude of discretion with the administrative agencies than would otherwise be the case. It is for that reason that the bill in dealing with a number of difficult problems singles out these problems as matters appropriate to be subject to restrictive rules and regulations, but leaves to the administrative agencies the determination of the most appropriate form of rule or regulation to be enforced. In a field where practices constantly vary and where practices legitimate for some purposes may be turned to illegitimate and fraudulent means, broad discretionary powers in the administrative agency have been found practically essential, despite the desire of the committee to limit the discretion of the administrative agencies so far as compatible with workable legislation. It has been represented that the pleas of the representatives of the stock exchanges for the vesting of broad discretionary powers in the administrative agencies have been made with a view to subjecting the bill to constitutional attack at a later date. The committee has, however, taken the pleas in good faith, believing that the nature of the legislation is such as to justify within constitutional limitations that measure of flexibility required in dealing with so intricate a subject matter.

ORGANIZATION OF BILL

The chief provisions of the bill may be grouped under six headings: (a) control of credits; (b) control of manipulative practices; (c) provision of adequate and honest reports to securities holders by registered corporations; (d) control of unfair practices of corporate insiders; (e) control of exchanges and over-the-counter markets; (f) administration.

CONTROL OF CREDITS

The underlying theory of the bill with respect to control of credit is as follows:

(1) Without adequate control the too strong attraction of a speculative stock market for credit prevents a balanced utilization of the Nation's credit resources in commerce, industry, and agriculture.

(2) To effect such better balance, all speculative credit should be subjected to the central control of the Federal Reserve Board as the most experienced and best equipped credit agency of the Government.

(3) To achieve that control the Federal Reserve Board should be vested with the most effectual and direct power over speculative credit, i.e., the power to control margins on the actual ultimate speculative loans themselves.

(4) Both for the direction and the protection of the Federal Reserve Board in the administration of flexible powers, Congress should offer the Board some definite margin standard to indicate the judgment of Congress that the amount of credit previously routed through the stock markets has been excessive and to indicate the approximate proportion in which such amount should be reduced.

To accomplish these purposes, sections 6 and 7 of the bill gives the Federal Reserve Board power to control speculative credit. The problem of control has been approached from several directions because of the certainty that no purpose of the bill will be more tempting to evasion. Borrowings by brokers to finance their customers are confined to borrowings from or through member banks of the Federal Reserve System or those nonmember banks which apply for a license from the Board. With respect to loans to the ultimate speculating customer, the Board is substantially given power by rules and regulations to fix margins on (a) all loans on securities from brokers to customers, and (b) loans from banks and others to customers made on equity securities and to carry or purchase securities. For the purposes of guiding and protecting the Board from undue speculative pressure in the exercise of its discretion, the bill includes as a standard for the rules and regulations of the Board a limitation of credit on the initial granting of loans to 55 percent of the current market price of the securities offered as collateral, or 100 percent of the lowest market price of the preceding 3 years, whichever is the greater.

To avoid any conceivable deflationary effects upon presently existing loans on securities, all such loans, and renewals and extensions thereof, are exempt from the application of section 6 until January 1, 1939.

The main purpose of these margin provisions in section 6 is not to increase the safety of security loans for lenders. Banks and brokers normally require sufficient collateral to make themselves safe without the help of law. Nor is the main purpose even protection of the small speculator by making it impossible for him to spread himself too thinly—although such a result will be achieved as a byproduct of the main purpose.

The main purpose is to give a Government credit agency an effective method of reducing the aggregate amount of the Nation's credit resources which can be directed by speculation into the stock market and out of other more desirable uses of commerce and industry—to prevent a recurrence of the pre-crash situation where funds which would otherwise have been available at normal interest rates for uses of local commerce, industry, and agriculture, were drained by far higher rates into security loans and the New York call market. Increasing margins—i.e., decreasing the amounts which brokers or banks may lend for the speculative purchase and carrying of stocks—is the most direct and most effective method of discouraging an abnormal attraction of funds into the stock market.

When margins are discussed with this main purpose in mind, differences between the collateral value of gild-edged bonds and speculative stocks, the credit-worthiness of particular borrowers and similar considerations which have been urged as reasons why each loan should be treated as a particular problem in itself—considerations which affect not a general national-credit policy, but only the safety of a particular stock transaction from the standpoint of a particular lender and particular borrower—are unimportant.

Section 6 empowers the Federal Reserve Board to prescribe margins for both brokers and banks on securities registered on exchanges licensed under the bill (hereinafter referred to as "registered securities")—both for the initial opening and for the maintenance or carrying of accounts. The Board is given complete legal authority to fix margins at any point. But a standard is included in the bill as an indication by Congress to the Board that from the standpoint of a general policy of utilization of national credit resources, the Board should control the credit available to the stock market to an amount roughly corresponding to such standard.

To protect margin requirements from evasion, brokers may lend only on listed securities excepting exempted securities. Banks are subject to margin limitations only on loans on registered equity securities in cases where the loan is sought for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities. The Board is not required to fix the same margins for banks as for brokers and is given a free hand in fixing margins for maintenance as distinguished from margins for the initial opening of accounts.

It has seemed necessary to empower the Board to fix margins for banks as well as for brokers (a) to prevent evasion of restrictions on brokers' margins through loans by banks; (b) to increase the powers of the Board over speculative loans by its member banks; and (c) to give the Board an effective power (it has no powers at present) over speculative loans by nonmember banks.

The margin standard in section 6 has been expressed as a percentage of market value which may be lent upon securities rather than of the amount which the customer is required to deposit at the time of his purchase. The basic loan value provided by the standard for the initial opening of an account is 55 percent of market value of the securities lent upon, i.e., from the standpoint of what the customer must "put up", a 45-percent margin. This standard is not indicated for the purposes of maintenance of the account. The 55-percent loan value indicated would govern in the long run of a rising market. But to afford easier margins for the present market and for a possible future declining market a more favorable alternative standard is indicated in section 6 (a) (2), which, by the finding of Standard Statistics Service, would operate to permit, at the present time, an average initial loan value of 65½ percent of market value on the stocks now listed on the New York Stock Exchange, or, from the customer's point of view, a margin of only 34½ percent.

Under this alternative standard, the margin is only 25 percent in the case of a security that is selling at not more than 33½ percent above its 3-year low. As the security increases in price, the margin required gradually increases proportionately until, when the security has reached a price that is more than 80 percent above its 3-year low, a margin of 45 percent is required. This flexible margin standard permits a relatively low margin in the case of stable securities such as bonds, while it requires a higher margin in the case of volatile securities after they have risen substantially in market price. Since the margin increases as the price of the security rises, pyramiding on paper profits is made difficult.

Section 6 seems to furnish a very practical program of controlling the volume of stock-market credit, since it embodies a combination of a basic formula, initially setting minimum margins, with a more general discretionary administrative control, which should be based on the total amount of credit outstanding, the level of stock prices, the phase of the business and financial cycle, and so forth. Between the time when changes are made by the Federal Reserve Board, margin requirements would be automatically raised or lowered by the movements of stock prices. Such a self-adjusting mechanism would probably function better, in actual practice, than any system wherein margin requirements are changed only by deliberate action of the Board and remain unadjusted except when the Board takes such action.

The 55-percent standard expressed in the statute is, however, so deliberately overlenient for the purpose of encouraging the markets at this particular point in the recovery program, that the Board in exercising its discretion would be expected to lower this 55-percent figure considerably after the market reaches more normal levels.

CONTROL OF MANIPULATIVE PRACTICES

To insure to the multitude of investors the maintenance of fair and honest markets, manipulative practices of all kinds on national exchanges are banned. The bill seeks to give to investors markets where prices may be established by the free and honest balancing of investment demand with investment supply. Investors are free to buy and sell virtually without restraint. But wash sales and matched orders and other devices designed to create a misleading appearance of activity with a view to enticing the unwary into the market on the hope of quick gains are definitely prohibited. False and misleading statements designed to induce investors to buy when they should sell and to sell when they should buy are also outlawed and penalized.

But the most subtle manipulating device employed in the security markets is not simply the crude form of a wash sale or a matched order. It is the conscious marking-up of prices to make investors believe that there is a constantly increasing demand for stocks at higher prices, or the conscious marking-down of stocks to make investors believe that an increasing number of investors are selling as prices recede. Legitimate investors desire to buy at as low a price as possible and to sell at as high a price as possible, and honest markets are made by the balancing of investment demand and investment supply.

The provisions concerning manipulative practices have been drawn in light of the results of the recent investigation conducted by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency. Despite all the talk of good pools and bad pools, no evidence has been submitted to this committee that would justify the recognition of a good stock-market pool. As the Twentieth Century Fund in its recent report on "Stock Market Control" states—

"As a matter of fact, any pool which seeks to bring about a change in the price of a security through manipulation is 'illegitimate' according to our definition, inasmuch as it thereby lessens the efficiency of an exchange in the performance of those functions which, as we indicated, are the only justification for its existence."

If the pool to "rig" or "jiggle" the market is wrong, it necessarily follows that the market must be purged of reports about activities for the rise or operations for the decline. If brokers and other interested persons are permitted to spread through brokerage and publicity channels constant reports regarding such activities, it is doubtful whether stimulated activity would not accomplish much the same effect as is accomplished by the direct mark-up or mark-down prices by the pool. For that reason the circulation of reports of market operations conducted for a rise or for a decline is prohibited.

The evidence as to the value of pegging and stabilizing operations, particularly in relation to new issues, is far from conclusive. While abuses are undoubtedly associated with such manipulation, because of the desire of the committee to proceed cautiously such operations have not been forbidden altogether, but have been subjected to such control as the administrative commission may find necessary in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

The granting of options to pools and syndicates has been found to be at the bottom of most manipulative operations, because the granting of these options permits large-scale manipulations to be conducted with a minimum of financial risk to the manipulators. The bill, therefore, gives the administrative commission power to regulate dealing in options or trading in options. The connection of pool activity with the option has recently been recognized in the rules of the New York Stock Exchange. As it is not always easy to trace and prove manipulative activity, it is necessary to rid the market of devices which commonly accompany or cloak these activities. Short selling and stop-loss orders, which have been the source of much abuse, are brought within the regulatory power of the administrative commission.

There is plenty of room for legitimate speculation in the balancing of investment demand and supply, in the shrewd prognostication of future trends and economic directions; but the accentuation of temporary fluctuations and the deliberate introduction of a mob psychology into the speculative markets by the fanfare of organized manipulation menace the true functioning of the exchanges, upon which the economic well-being of the whole country depends.

To make effective the prohibitions against manipulation civil redress is given to those able to prove actual damages from any of the prohibited practices.

PROVISION OF ADEQUATE AND HONEST REPORTS TO SECURITIES HOLDERS BY REGISTERED CORPORATIONS

No investor, no speculator, can safely buy and sell securities upon the exchanges without having an intelligent basis for forming his judgment as to the value of the securities he buys or sells. The idea of a free and open public market is built upon the theory that competing judgments of buyers and sellers as to the fair price of a security brings about a situation where the market price reflects as nearly as possible a just price. Just as artificial manipulation tends to upset the true function of an open market, so the hiding and secreting of important information obstruct the operation of the markets as indices of real value. There cannot be honest markets without honest publicity. Manipulation and dishonest practices of the market place thrive upon mystery and secrecy. The disclosure of information materially important to investors may not instantaneously be reflected in market value, but despite the intricacies of security values truth does find relatively quick acceptance on the market. That is why in many cases it is so carefully guarded. Delayed, inaccurate, and misleading reports are the tools of the unconscionable market operator and the recreant corporate official who speculate on inside information. Despite the tug of conflicting interests and the influence of powerful groups, responsible officials of the leading exchanges have unqualifiedly recognized in theory at least the vital importance of true and accurate corporate reporting as an essential cog in the proper functioning of the public exchanges. Their efforts to bring about more adequate and prompt publicity have been handicapped by the lack of legal power and by the failure of certain banking and business groups to appreciate that a business that gathers its capital from the investing public has not the same right to secrecy as a small privately owned and managed business. It is only a few decades since men believed that the disclosure of a balance sheet was a disclosure of a trade secret. Today few people would admit the right of any company to solicit public funds without the disclosure of a balance sheet.

The need of proper and adequate reporting as an adjunct of the proper functioning of the exchanges has been expressed by the realistic and responsible executive assistant of the committee on stock list of the New York Stock Exchange:

"It has been said a hundred times that accounting is a matter of conventions, and it is questionable whether these conventions have kept pace with the changes in modern business conditions. As the art stands today, it appears to the business man to have evolved with primary emphasis upon two objects:

"(a) To give to management that accurate information and aid which are essential to the successful conduct of a business, and (b) to give to actual and prospective creditors that accurate information essential to the determination of the volume of credit which may safely be extended and the conditions under which it may be allowed.

"Under conditions of ownership where the number of partners or stockholders was small, where enterprises were largely managed by their owners, or by the personally chosen representatives of a few owners in close contact with the business, and where it was the custom to finance permanently but little beyond minimum needs and to borrow largely to meet peak needs, accounting adequately performing these two functions probably sufficiently served the needs of the then situation. In the meantime the wide-spread diffusion of corporate ownership, with which we are all familiar, has occurred. There are few large enterprises which have not taken on the corporate form and a large proportion of the total ownership is in the hands of millions of relatively small investors who have no direct contact with management and whose only knowledge of the company is derived from its financial reports. In recent years there has been a marked tendency to finance more or less permanently for peak requirements, becoming lenders of money at the time of minimum requirements, and so tending to lessen the aggregate volume of bank credit needed.

"Because of these changes, coupled with a growing tendency toward extreme broadness and flexibility in the corporation laws of many States, the time appears to have arrived for some changes of emphasis as to the objects to be achieved by sound accounting practice. While there have been able efforts devoted toward this end, the result so far generally attained does not seem to me sufficient to meet the needs. The need of accurate information for the aid of management is still paramount; but, under conditions of today, the next object in order of importance has become 'to give to stockholders, in understandable form, such information in regard to the business as will avoid misleading them in any respect and as will put them in possession of all information needed, and which can be supplied in financial statements, to determine the true value of their investments.'

"This is, of course, the object in which the stock exchange is particularly interested. The primary object of the exchange is to afford facilities for trading in securities under the safest and fairest conditions attainable. In order that parties may trade on even terms they should have, as far as is practicable, the same opportunities for knowledge in regard to the subject matter of the trade.

"The exchange is interested in the accounts of companies as a source of reliable information for those who deal in stocks. It is not sufficient for the stock exchange that the accounts should be in conformity with law or even that they should be conservative; the stock exchange desires that they should be fully and fairly informative."

The president of the New York Stock Exchange has effectively answered those who contend that such publicity will give advantage to competitors:

"The public, today, insists upon more complete and accurate financial statements from publicly owned companies, and I am sure that the officials and directors of these corporations, realizing the reasonableness of this demand, will furnish investors with adequate information. There have not been many instances where the failure to give complete information was due to a desire on the part of directors or officers to secure unfair personal advantage. However, many company officials did not publish complete financial statements because they were afraid that the disclosure of too much information would put their companies at a disadvantage in meeting competition, not only from other American corporations, but frequently from foreign companies engaged in the same line of business. This fear, though genuine, has in large measure proved to be unfounded."

The reporting provisions of the proposed legislation are a very modest beginning to afford that long-denied aid to the exchanges in the way of securing proper information for the investor. The provisions carefully guard against the disclosure of trade secrets or processes. But the idea that a fair report of corporate assets and profits give unfair advantage to competitors is no longer seriously entertained by any modern business man. The realistic corporate executive knows that his alert competitors have a pretty good notion of what his business is; and if he is unable to compete with them, it is because he is hopelessly behind in the keen competitive struggle. The reporting provisions of the legislation have been approved by such conservative investment services as Moody's and Standard Statistics, and, despite the wild fears spread throughout the country by powerful lobbyists against this bill, intelligent business men recognize that general knowledge of business facts will only help and cannot hurt them. The possession of these facts has for a number of years been the exclusive perquisite of powerful banking and industrial groups. Making these facts generally available will be of material benefit and guidance to business as a whole.

CONTROL OF UNFAIR PRACTICES BY CORPORATE INSIDERS

A renewal of investors' confidence in the exchange markets can be effected only by a clearer recognition upon the part of the corporate managers of companies whose securities are publicly held of their responsibilities as trustees for their corporations. Men charged with the administration of other people's money must not use inside information for their own advantage. Because it is difficult to draw a clear line as a matter of law between truly inside information and information generally known by the better-informed investors, the most potent weapon against the abuse of inside information is full and prompt publicity. For that reason, this bill requires the disclosure of the corporate holdings of officers and directors and stockholders owning more than 5 percent of any class of stock, and prompt disclosure of any changes that occur in their corporate holdings. Short selling and selling against the box by insiders are prohibited. These provisions have been called the "anti-Wiggin provisions" of the bill. The committee is aware that these requirements are not airtight and that the unscrupulous insider may still, within the law, use inside information for his own advantage. It is hoped, however, that the publicity features of the bill will tend to bring these practices into disrepute and encourage the voluntary maintenance of proper fiduciary standards by those in control of large corporate enterprises whose securities are registered on the public exchanges.

Fair corporate suffrage is an important right that should attach to every equity security bought on a public exchange. Management of properties owned by the investing public should not be permitted to perpetuate themselves by the misuse of corporate proxies. Insiders having little or no substantial interest in the properties they manage have often retained their control without an adequate disclosure of their interest and without an adequate explanation of the management policies they intend to pursue. Insiders have at times solicited proxies without fairly informing the stockholders of the purposes for which the proxies are to be used and have used such proxies to take from the stockholders for their own selfish advantage valuable property rights. Inasmuch as only the exchanges make it possible for securities to be widely distributed among the investing public, it follows as a corollary that the use of the exchanges should involve a corresponding duty of, according to shareholders, fair suffrage. For this reason the proposed bill gives the Federal Trade Commission power to control the conditions under which proxies may be solicited with a view to preventing the recurrence of abuses which have frustrated the free exercise of the voting rights of stockholders.

CONTROL OF THE EXCHANGES AND OVER-THE-COUNTER MARKETS

The importance of the actual workings of the exchanges themselves, although great, should not be exaggerated. The stronger and more subtle economic forces affecting speculation come from without the exchanges. But as this speculation converges upon the exchanges, the control of the exchange mechanism is a necessary part of any effective regulation. It is for that reason that the bill gives the Federal Trade Commission broad powers over the exchanges to insure their efficient and honest functioning. Theoretically floor trading has been assumed to be of value in stabilizing prices and preventing undue fluctuations. The studies conducted by the special counsel for the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency have thrown considerable doubt upon the value of floor trading. The large floor traders seldom stem the tide but run with it. Their activity tends to accentuate the moves of the market and to stimulate undue speculation. The importance of active, constant trading can readily be exaggerated. A relatively stable market over a period is of much greater importance to investors than a fictitiously stable market that involves no more than one eighth of a point spread between sales but results in wide fluctuations over days or weeks. The market's liquidity depends upon its relative stability and not upon the spreads between momentary sales. To prevent the artificial stimulation of the market that comes from excessive speculative trading unrelated to investment, the Commission is given power to regulate and, if need be, prevent floor trading. The Commission is further given power to prevent excessive trading by members off the floor who at times are tempted to stimulate the market by numerous in-and-out transactions which cost them nothing more than the nominal commissions paid to the $2 brokers.

No issue has been more disputed than that centering about the functions of the specialist. There are many who believe that the exchange mechanism would function better without the specialist, that the work done by the specialist could be done more effectively by a clerk or official of the exchange clearing the orders in a purely mechanical way, much as they are cleared today on the New York Stock Exchange in the "bond crowd." There are others who believe that a specialist should be obliged to act either as a dealer or as a broker and should not be permitted to combine the functions of dealer and broker. The jobber on the London Stock Exchange is essentially a dealer-specialist who deals only with other jobbers and with brokers, and does not act as a broker himself or deal with the public directly. It is generally admitted that there are serious abuses in connection with the work of specialists. The New York Stock Exchange tightened its rules in regard to specialists on the very eve of the hearings held by the committee. It is true that some of the worst evils associated with the specialist have centered around their participation in pools, but there are inherent difficulties in the situation where under normal circumstances the available orders are known to the specialist only—and perhaps his favored friends—and not to everyone dealing in the security involved. Inasmuch as the stock exchanges objected to the laying down of any statutory rule governing specialists, their suggestion has been adopted of giving the Commission effective power to control the activities of specialists and to experiment with various devices of control.

Another perplexing problem in regard to the working of the exchanges has been that centering about the dealer-broker relationship. There is an inherent inconsistency in a man's acting both as a broker and a dealer. It is difficult to serve two masters. And it is particularly difficult to give impartial advice to a client if the dealer-broker has his own securities to sell, particularly when they are new securities for which there is no ready market. The combination of the functions of dealer and broker has persisted over a long period of time in American investment banking, and it was found difficult to break up this relationship at a time when the dealer business was in the doldrums and when it was feared that the bulk of the dealer-brokers would, if compelled to choose, give up their dealer business and leave, temporarily at least, an impaired mechanism for the distribution of new securities. Consequently, it was deemed impracticable at this time to do more than require the dealer-broker to disclose to his customer the capacity in which he was acting and to refrain from taking into margin accounts new securities in the distribution of which he had participated during the preceding 6 months.

The bill proceeds on the theory that the exchanges are public institutions which the public is invited to use for the purchase and sale of securities listed thereon and are not private clubs to be conducted only in accordance with the interests of their members. The great exchanges of this country upon which millions of dollars of securities are sold are affected with a public interest in the same degree as any other great utility. The Commission is empowered, if the rules of the exchange in any important matter are not appropriate for the protection of investors or appropriate to insure fair dealing, to order such changes in the rules after due notice and hearings as it may deem necessary. The exchanges may alter their rules if more effective means are discovered to meet the same or new problems. Although a wide measure of initiative and responsibility is left with the exchanges, reserved control is in the Commission if the exchanges do not meet their responsibility. It is hoped that the effect of the bill will be to give to the well-managed exchanges that power necessary to enable them to effect themselves needed reforms and that the occasion for direct action by the Commission will not arise.

The committee has been convinced that effective regulation of the exchanges requires as a corollary a measure of control over the over-the-counter markets. The problem is clearly put in the recent report of the Twentieth Century Fund on Stock Market Control:

"The benefits that would accrue as the result of raising the standards of security exchanges might be nullified if the over-the-counter markets were left unregulated and uncontrolled. They are of vast proportions, and they would serve as a refuge for any business that might seek to escape the discipline of the exchanges; and the more exacting that discipline, the greater the temptation to escape from it. Over-the-counter markets offer facilities that are useful under certain conditions, but they should not be permitted to expand beyond their proper sphere and compete with the exchanges for business that, from the point of view of public interest, should be confined to the organized markets. This constitutes the sanction for Federal regulation of over-the-counter dealers and brokers. To leave the over-the-counter markets out of a regulatory system would be to destroy the effects of regulating the organized exchanges."

ADMINISTRATION

The bill places the administration of the legislation, apart from credit phases, in the Federal Trade Commission. It provides, however, for the enlargement of that Commission by two members and the creation within it of a special division which will administer both this bill and the Securities Act of 1933. Unquestionably these two measures are so closely related that they should be administered by the same body, and unquestionably if no new commission were to be appointed that administration should be lodged in the Federal Trade Commission, which has so ably organized the administration of the Securities Act of 1933.

Insofar as the proposals of the stock exchanges suggest a separate stock-exchange authority, it should be kept in mind that the name by which the body administering the act is known is not important. The legislative essentials are the same whether the body is called an "authority" or a "board" or a "Federal commission." Those essentials are how much power the administrative body shall have and whether it shall be made up entirely of representatives of none but the public interest, or of expert representatives, as such, of stock exchanges and of other distinct classes in the community.

Insofar as experts are concerned, it is a commonplace of administrative statesmanship that boards of men who are experts in details rarely agree among themselves, and in their very expertness with the trees seldom perceive the woods of broad public policy. The well-learned lesson of democratic government with experts is that they should be kept on tap but not on top.

Insofar as making up a permanent Government regulatory body from representatives of special vested interests is concerned, it has been long ago learned that no harmony of policy can result from a regulatory body packed with advocates of warring interests and that the inevitable result of placing on a regulatory authority able advocates who have at heart the definite interest of a particular class which will profit by the least possible regulation is stultification of the regulation.

III. ANALYSIS OF THE BILL BY SECTIONS

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE

SECTION 2. THE NECESSITY FOR REGULATION AS PROVIDED IN THIS ACT

The purpose of this section is to indicate the facts which give rise to the necessity for the legislation and justify the exercise of congressional power. The evidence submitted to the committee, together with that produced before the Senate Banking and Currency Committee during its recent extensive investigation and facts that have become common knowledge during the national economic crisis of the past few years, abundantly justify the findings recited in this section.

SECTION 3. DEFINITIONS AND APPLICATION OF ACT

(a) This subsection defines the terms used in the act. Most of these definitions are self-explanatory. Banks are expressly exempted from the definitions of "broker" and "dealer." The definition of "bank" in paragraph (6) includes banks organized under the laws of the United States, members of the Federal Reserve System, and any other bank performing the normal functions of receiving deposits or exercising fiduciary powers and which is subject to supervision and examination by State or Federal authorities. In paragraph (10) the words "oil, gas, or other" have been stricken out of that part of the definition of "security", as it appeared in earlier prints of the bill, which included any "certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement or in any oil, gas, or other mineral royalty or lease." From the use of the words "other mineral royalty or lease" in the earlier print it is clear that an oil or gas royalty or lease was considered to be one kind of mineral royalty or lease, and thus no actual change is made by striking out the words indicated above. An "exempted security" is defined in paragraph (12) to include certain specified classes of securities. In addition, the Secretary of the Treasury may designate for exemption the securities of corporations in which the United States has a direct or indirect interest; and the Federal Trade Commission (elsewhere referred to as the "Commission") is given power to place in the category of "exempted securities" any other securities (including unregistered securities the market in which is predominantly intrastate) where it deems such action necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of investors. A large number of the provisions in the act expressly exclude "exempted securities." Thus the Commission is able to remove from the operation of any one or more of these provisions any securities as to which it deems them inappropriate. It may attach such conditions as to such exemption as it deems desirable. The Commission may therefore make appropriate exemptions for the protection of the holders of defaulted securities and foreign securities if the issuers refuse to register.

(b) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board are given power to define accounting, technical, and trade terms.

(c) The act is not to apply to instrumentalities and agencies of the United States, except where they are specifically included.

SECTION 4. TRANSACTIONS ON UNREGISTERED EXCHANGES

This section forbids the use of the mails and interstate commerce to any exchange which is not registered as a national securities exchange under section 5, but authorizes the Commission to exempt from this prohibition small exchanges as to which it finds that registration would be impracticable and unnecessary in the public interest or for the protection of investors. Such exemption may be withdrawn under stated circumstances.

SECTION 5. REGISTRATION OF NATIONAL SECURITIES EXCHANGES

Subsection (a) provides for registration as a national securities exchange upon application by any exchange which agrees to comply, and to require its members to comply, with the act and the rules and regulations thereunder, and which furnishes the Commission with required information.

An exchange desiring registration is required by subsection (b) to provide for the disciplining of members who are guilty of conduct inconsistent with just and equitable principles of trade, and must include in this category any willful violation of the act or any rule or regulation thereunder.

It is provided in subsection (c) that exchanges may adopt any rules not inconsistent with the act or the rules and regulations thereunder or the laws of the State in which it is located.

Subsection (d) directs the Commission to grant an application for registration if it appears that the exchange is so organized as to be able to comply with the act and rules and regulations thereunder and to insure fair dealing and the protection of investors.

Subsection (e) provides that the Commission's order granting or denying an application for registration shall be made within 30 days unless the application has been withdrawn.

Subsection (f) permits an exchange to withdraw its registration upon such terms as the Commission may deem necessary for the protection of investors.

SECTION 6. MARGIN REQUIREMENTS

The Federal Reserve Board is directed by subsection (a) to prescribe by rules and regulations the maximum amount of credit which may be extended and maintained on any security (other than an exempted security) which is registered on a national securities exchange. As far as the initial extension of credit is concerned it is indicated by the act that this should be based on a standard of 55 percent of the current market price of the security or 100 percent of its lowest market price during the preceding 36 calendar months, but in no case more than 75 percent of the current market price. Until July 1, 1936, the lowest price on or after July 1, 1933, is to be considered as the lowest price during the preceding 36 calendar months. Matters of detail concerning the maintenance of margins, substitutions, additional purchases, withdrawals, and transfers of accounts are left to be determined by the Board, which is also given power to prescribe regulations with regard to margins in the case of delayed deliveries, short sales, arbitrage transactions, securities which have not been on the market for 36 months, and similar matters of administrative adjustment.

Under subsection (b) the Federal Reserve Board may depart from the standard indicated in subsection (a) for the initial extension of credit by (1) lowering margin requirements insofar as it deems necessary for the accommodation of commerce and industry, having due regard to the general credit situation, and (2) prescribing such higher margin requirements as it may deem necessary or appropriate to prevent the excessive use of credit to finance speculative transactions in securities. Thus the effect is to make the margin provisions of the act completely elastic, giving the Federal Reserve Board discretion, but at the same time indicating a standard to which it is to adhere except under the circumstances indicated.

Subsection (c) makes it unlawful for a member of a national securities exchange or a broker or dealer who does business through such a member to extend or maintain credit in violation of the regulations prescribed under subsections (a) and (b), or without collateral or on collateral other than an exempted security or a security registered upon a national securities exchange, except insofar as this is permitted by rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board where such use of credit is not for the purpose of purchasing or carrying securities or of evading the margin requirements for registered securities.

Subsection (d) authorizes the Board to make rules and regulations so far as may be necessary to prevent evasion of this section through loans from persons who are not covered by subsection (c) and permits the imposition, upon loans made for the purchasing or carrying of registered securities, of limitations similar to those which may be imposed upon members, brokers, and dealers. It is expressly provided that such regulations shall not apply to loans not made in the course of business (such as purely personal loans), to loans on exempted securities, to loans to aid dealers in the distribution of securities not through the medium of a national securities exchange, to bank loans on any security other than an equity security or to such other loans as the Board may deem it necessary or appropriate to exempt. (An equity security is defined in sec. 3 (a) (11), and is, to speak generally, a stock or a security convertible into a security similar thereto.)

Subsection (e) makes the provisions of this entire section inapplicable to credit outstanding at the effective date of the act until January 31, 1939. This is designed to prevent forced liquidation.

SECTION 7. RESTRICTIONS ON BORROWING BY MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

By subsection (a), borrowing on registered securities (other than exempted securities) by members, brokers, and dealers who do a business through members is confined to loans from member banks of the Federal Reserve System or from nonmember banks which agree to comply with the provisions of this act, the Federal Reserve Act, and the Banking Act of 1933, insofar as they relate to the use of credit to finance transactions in securities. This, however, is subject to certain exceptions in case of transactions between members, brokers, and dealers and in emergency cases.

Subsection (b) prohibits a member, broker, or dealer to permit his indebtedness (except on exempted securities) in the ordinary course of business as a broker to exceed 2,000 percent of his net capital or such lower percentage thereof as the commission may prescribe.

A broker is forbidden by subsection (c) to commingle the securities of customers without their written consent; and by subsection (d) regardless of such consent to pledge customers' securities with those of persons who are not customers or under circumstances that will subject customers' securities to a lien in excess of the aggregate indebtedness of the customers. This means that a broker cannot risk the securities of his customers to finance his own speculative operations. He is also forbidden by subsection (e) to lend a customer's securities without the latter's written consent.

SECTION 8. PROHIBITION AGAINST MANIPULATION OF SECURITY PRICES

Subsection (a) makes it unlawful for any person to use the mails, or interstate commerce, or any facility of a national securities exchange, or for any member of a national securities exchange by use of any means, to participate in certain practices in connection with securities registered on a national securities exchange.

Under paragraph (1) of this subsection it is made unlawful for the purpose of creating a misleading appearance as to the real nature of the market or activity of trading in the security, (A) to effect any transaction which involves no change in the beneficial ownership of the security, or (B) to enter orders for the purchase of a security with the knowledge that orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time and at substantially the same price, for the sale of such security will be entered by or for the same or different parties, or (C) to enter orders for the sale of a security with the knowledge of orders of substantially the same size, at substantially the same time and at substantially the same price, for the purchase of such security, will be entered for the same by or for the same or different parties. These provisions strike at wash sales and matched orders.

Paragraph (2) makes it unlawful to effect any series of transactions in a security for the purpose of raising or depressing the price of such security. Of course, any extensive purchases or sales are bound to cause changes in the market price of the security. If a person is merely trying to acquire a large block of stock for investment, or desires to dispose of a big holding, his knowledge that in doing so he will affect the market price does not make his action unlawful. His transactions become unlawful only when they are made for the purpose of raising or depressing the market price. This provision catches the rigging and jiggling of the market, and prevents the marking up or down of prices by pools.

Inducing the sale or purchase of securities by the making of a false or misleading statement of a material fact is outlawed by paragraph (4), unless the person making the statement had no reason to believe the statement was false or misleading.

Paragraphs (3) and (5) make it unlawful to induce the purchase or sale of a security by circulating in the ordinary course of business or for a consideration information that a security will change in price as a result of market operations for a rise or fall. These provisions are aimed at the tipster sheet and the practice of customer's men in inducing customers to buy or sell by spreading rumors with regard to the operations of pools.

The pegging of security prices is regulated by paragraph (6). Many experts are of the opinion that the artificial stabilization of a security at a given price serves no useful economic function. On the other hand the practice has been wide-spread on the part of many investment bankers who regard it legitimate, particularly if the public is aware of the plan. Instead of being prohibited, therefore, this practice is left to such regulation by the Commission as it may deem necessary for the prevention of activities detrimental to the interests of investors.

Subsection (b) is concerned with the use of options in connection with transactions on national securities exchanges. Options and trading against options are the usual concomitants of pool operations. Inasmuch, however, as it has been urged that all options are not affected with the manipulative taint it is made unlawful to trade in or against options only when in violation of such rules and regulations as the Commission may deem necessary in the public interest or for the protection of investors.

Subsection (c) empowers the Commission to make regulations regarding the guaranteeing of options for registered securities by members of national security exchanges.

Subsection (d) makes it clear that the options to be regulated under subsections (b) and (c), which include so-called "puts", "calls", "straddles", and "privileges"—which are commonly used for manipulative and speculative purposes—do not include duly registered warrants or rights to subscribe to a security or the right of the holder of a registered convertible security to have it converted.

Subsection (e) provides that persons who willfully participate in the manipulative or speculative practices which are forbidden by subsections (a), (b), and (c) shall be liable for the damages they cause to innocent investors who have bought or sold the security in question at a price which has been effected by such unlawful practices. A defendant may recover contribution from any other participant in the illegal transactions who would have been liable if sued jointly. Suits for recovery under this subsection must be commenced within 3 years after the violation.

Subsection (f) exempts from the operation of this section all exempted securities.

SECTION 9. REGULATION OF THE USE OF MANIPULATIVE DEVICES

This section makes it unlawful to use the mails or interstate commerce or any facility of a national securities exchange to effect a short sale of, or to employ any stop-loss order in connection with a transaction in, a registered security in contravention of the regulations of the Commission.

SECTION 10. SEGREGATION AND LIMITATION OF FUNCTIONS OF MEMBERS, BROKERS, AND DEALERS

Subsection (a) directs the Commission to regulate or prevent, by rules and regulations, floor trading on the part of members. By this means those who are actually on the scene of speculation may be restricted from taking undue advantage of this privilege. The Commission is also directed by rules and regulations to prevent such excessive speculation on the part of members who operate from off the floor as it may deem detrimental to the maintenance of a fair and orderly market. The Commission may make such exemptions as are necessary or appropriate in the case of exempted securities, arbitrage transactions, and transactions by odd-lot dealers and specialists.

Subsection (b) authorizes the registration of members as odd-lot dealers or specialists, or both, pursuant to the rules of the exchange, and subject to rules and regulations of the Commission. The odd-lot dealer may be permitted to deal for his own account only so far as necessary in the performance of his particular function. The Commission is directed to limit the specialist in his dealings for his own account to those which are necessary for the maintenance of a fair and orderly market. The specialist is forbidden to reveal the orders on his books to favored persons. This information must be available to all members or else kept confidential. The specialist is likewise prohibited from exercising purely discretionary orders as distinct from market or limited price orders.

Subsection (c) authorizes the Commission to exempt small exchanges from the provisions of this section. This will prevent hardship on those exchanges where the functions of members are not as highly specialized as on the larger markets. Provision is made for withdrawing the exemption in proper cases.

Subsection (d) provides that any member, or any person doing business through a member, who acts both as a broker and dealer shall not use the mails, or interstate commerce, or any national securities exchange to effect any transaction which involves purchasing for a customer on margin, or selling to him on margin, any security which the broker or dealer has been engaged in distributing within 6 months. This strikes at one of the greatest potential evils inherent in the combination of the broker and dealer function in the same person, by assuring that he will not induce his customers to buy on credit securities which he has undertaken to distribute to the public. A broker-dealer must also reveal to his customers whether he acts as principal or as agent, in order that the customer may be aware of any factors tending to influence the broker's advice.

Subsection (e) directs the Commission to investigate and report to Congress by January 3, 1936, on the question of completely segregating the activities of brokers and dealers.

SECTION 11. REGISTRATION REQUIREMENTS FOR SECURITIES

Subsection (a) prohibits members, brokers, and dealers from effecting any transaction on a national securities exchange in any security which is not exempted or registered under the provisions of this act.

The application to be filed by the issuer of a security with the exchange and with the Commission as a prerequisite to registration is described in subsection (b).

In paragraph (1) is indicated the information which the Commission may require an issuer to file in its application for registration. These provisions are self-explanatory.

Under paragraph (2) various documents, such as articles of incorporation, bylaws, and underwriting arrangements, may be called for.

Subsection (c) authorizes the Commission, if it deems any of the information specified under subsection (b) to be inappropriate in a given case or class of cases, to require in lieu thereof the submission of appropriate information of a comparable character. This assures adequate elasticity without giving the Commission unconfined authority to elicit any information whatsoever.

If an exchange approves the registration of a security and so certifies to the Commission, the registration becomes effective within 30 days under subsection (d), subject, however, to the provisions of section 18. An issuer may cancel its registration at any time subject to such conditions as the Commission may prescribe as necessary for the protection of investors. Registration of unissued securities for trading on a "when, as, and if issued" basis is permitted subject to regulations of the Commission in cases where the registration is not primarily designed to distribute the security to investors other than the present security holders of the company. This permits the creation of an adequate market in which the holders of rights to unissued securities may trade them as against the value of the unissued securities. At the same time the Commission will be able to prevent the practice of running up the price of a security prior to its issuance, so that it is finally issued at an excessive price.

In order to preclude congestion during the period when the act first comes into force, subsection (e) would permit the provisional registration of securities already listed on exchanges without compliance with the registration requirements set forth in this section. Such registrations may be effective until July 1, 1935, by which date there should be more than adequate time for formal registration.

Subsection (f) provides that unlisted trading (the practice of admitting securities to trade upon the application of a member of the exchange and without any action on the part of the corporation) shall be permitted by the rules and regulations of the Commission until July 1, 1935, in securities admitted to unlisted trading before March 1, 1934. Such securities are to be regarded as registered securities, except that they are exempt from the requirements of sections 11, 12, and 15, but in quoting transactions exchanges must specify the securities which are admitted merely to unlisted trading.

SECTION 12. PERIODICAL AND OTHER REPORTS

Subsection (a) requires the issuers of registered securities to keep the information filed under section 11 reasonably up to date and to make annual reports, certified by independent public accountants if the Commission deems this necessary, and such quarterly reports as may be deemed essential.

Subsection (b) permits the Commission to specify the form in which reports shall be made, the details to be shown in financial statements, and the methods to be followed in calculating the items indicated in their preparation. The purpose is to give some assurance that reports will not hide the true condition of the company. In the case of the reports of any person whose accounting is subject to the provisions of any law of the United States or of any State, the rules and regulations of the Commission imposing requirements with respect to reports are not to be inconsistent with the requirements imposed by such law; but if the Commission believes that such requirements are inadequate from the point of view of the investor, it may impose additional requirements. In other words, while the act carefully avoids unnecessary duplication of reports, it permits the Commission to require the reporting of all matters regarded as essential under the act for the protection of investors.

SECTION 13. PROXIES

Subsection (a) prohibits the solicitation of proxies in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe in the interest of the issuer and its security holders.

By subsection (b) it is made unlawful for a member of a national securities exchange or a broker or dealer who transacts a business in securities through a member to give proxies with respect to securities carried for a customer in contravention of such rules and regulations as the Commission may prescribe for the protection of investors.

SECTION 14. OVER-THE-COUNTER MARKETS

The use of the mails and interstate commerce for the creation of markets, other than regular exchanges, is made the basis for such regulation of these markets as the Commission may find to be necessary or appropriate to insure to investors protection comparable to that which is accorded in the case of registered exchanges under the act. Such rules and regulations may include provision for the registration of brokers and dealers and of the securities traded. Securities already traded in on exchanges at the time the act becomes effective may be subjected to special regulation if they do not become registered under section 11. This will enable the Commission to distinguish between the securities of the type normally subject to speculative and manipulative abuse and those not customarily bought or sold on exchanges.

SECTION 15. DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, AND PRINCIPAL STOCKHOLDERS

Under subsection (a) directors and officers of the issuer of a registered equity security (other than an exempted security) and holders of more than 5 percent of any class of a registered equity security (other than an exempted security), are required at the time of registration to file with the Commission a list of their holdings of the issuer's securities and to file monthly reports of their dealings in such securities. This is to give investors an idea of the purchases and sales by insiders which may in turn indicate their private opinion as to prospects of the company.

By subsection (b) directors, officers, and principal security holders are forbidden to sell registered securities (other than exempted securities) short or to sell for delivery after 20 days. The latter provision is for the purpose of preventing sales against the box whereby those in possession of inside information sell their holdings but keep the stock registered in their name, so that their change of position does not become known until delivery is made at a later date.

SECTION 16. ACCOUNTS AND RECORDS, REPORTS, EXAMINATION OF EXCHANGES, MEMBERS, AND OTHERS

By subsection (a) national securities exchanges, their members, and brokers and dealers who do business through them, as well as brokers and dealers who maintain over-the-counter markets, are required to keep such records as the Commission may prescribe in the public interest or for the protection of investors. These records shall be open to reasonable inspection by the Commission.

Subsection (b) gives the Federal Reserve Board necessary powers as to reports and examinations in connection with the exercise of its functions under the act.

SECTION 17. LIABILITY FOR MISLEADING STATEMENTS

Subsection (a) provides that any person who makes or causes to be made any statement in an application, report, or document, which is false or misleading as to a material fact, shall be liable to a person who in reliance on the statement and in ignorance of its false or misleading character has purchased the security to which it relates at a price affected by it, unless the person sued proved that he acted in good faith without knowledge of the false and misleading character of the statement.

Subsection (b) provides for contribution between persons who would be liable to be sued jointly, and subsection (c) limits the time for bringing a suit to 3 years after the violation.

SECTION 18. POWERS WITH RESPECT TO EXCHANGES AND SECURITIES

Subsection (a) authorizes the Commission, when it deems such action necessary—(1) to suspend or withdraw registration of an exchange which the Commission finds has violated the act or the rules and regulations thereunder or has failed to take adequate steps to enforce compliance therewith by its members, (2) to deny, postpone, suspend, or withdraw the registration of the security in case of violation by the issuer, (3) to suspend or expel a member or officer of an exchange who is guilty of a violation or of aiding a violation by acting as broker for a person whom he has reason to believe is engaged in a violation, and (4) summarily to suspend trade in any registered security for a period not exceeding 10 days or, with the approval of the President of the United States, summarily to suspend all trade on a registered exchange for not more than 90 days. Orders issued pursuant to (1), (2), and (3) must be preceded by appropriate notice and opportunity for hearing; action under (4) is of an emergency nature and therefore limited in time.

Subsection (b) authorizes the Commission to amend the rules of an exchange in certain particulars by rules and regulations, after the exchange has failed to comply with the Commission's written request for such amendment of the rules of the exchange as the Commission deems necessary or appropriate for the protection of investors or to insure fair dealing or administration of the exchange.

SECTION 19. LIABILITIES OF CONTROLLING PERSONS

By subsection (a) a person who controls a person subject to the act or a rule or regulation thereunder is made liable to the same extent as the person controlled unless the controlling person acted in good faith and did not induce the act in question.

Subsection (b) makes it unlawful for any person to do, through any other person, anything that he is forbidden to do himself.

Subsection (c) makes it unlawful for a director, officer, or security owner, without just cause, to hinder, delay, or obstruct the making of reports required of an issuer under this act.

In this section and in section 11, when reference is made to "control", the term is intended to include actual control as well as what has been called legally enforceable control. (See Handy & Harmon v. Burnet (1931) 284 U.S. 136.) It was thought undesirable to attempt to define the term. It would be difficult if not impossible to enumerate or to anticipate the many ways in which actual control may be exerted. A few examples of the methods used are stock ownership, lease, contract, and agency. It is well known that actual control sometimes may be exerted through ownership of much less than a majority of the stock of a corporation either by the ownership of such stock alone or through such ownership in combination with other factors.

SECTION 20. INVESTIGATIONS; INJUNCTIONS AND PROSECUTION OF OFFENSES

(a) The Commission is authorized to investigate violations of the act. The Commission is further authorized to investigate and to publish information concerning any facts, conditions, practices, or matters which it may deem necessary or appropriate to aid in the enforcement of the act or in prescribing rules and regulations.

(b) The Commission is authorized through its members, or officers designated by it, to administer oaths and affirmations, subpoena witnesses, compel their attendance, and require the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records.

(c) This subsection relates to compelling attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of evidence.

(d) This subsection is similar to one contained in the Federal Trade Commission Act, and provides that no person shall be excused from attending and testifying, but relieves any natural person from prosecution with respect to or on account of any matter concerning which he may testify or produce evidence.

(e) The Commission is authorized to seek the aid of the United States district courts to enjoin acts or practices in violation of the provisions of the act or rules and regulations.

(f) The district courts of the United States are given jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus commanding any person to comply with the provisions of the act or any order made thereunder.

SECTION 21. HEARINGS BY COMMISSION

This section provides that hearings of the Commission may be public and may be held before the Commission or any member or members thereof or any designated officer or officers and requires that appropriate records of hearings shall be kept.

SECTION 22. RULES AND REGULATIONS; ANNUAL REPORTS

(a) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board, respectively, are authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary for the execution of the functions granted to them under the act and are authorized for such purposes to classify issuers, securities, exchanges, and other persons or matters.

(b) The Commission and the Federal Reserve Board are directed to include in their annual reports to Congress such information and such recommendations for further legislation as they may deem advisable relating to the matters within their respective jurisdictions under the act.

SECTION 23. INFORMATION FILED WITH THE COMMISSION

(a) This subsection makes it clear that no person is to be required to reveal trade secrets or processes in applications, reports, or other documents.

(b) Any person filing information may object in writing to the public disclosure thereof, and the Commission is authorized to hear objections when it deems it advisable. In cases where objections are made the Commission is not to make the information public unless in its judgment disclosure thereof is in the public interest.

(c) It is made unlawful for any member, officer, or employee of the Commission to make disclosure of information which is not made available to the public as authorized in subsection (b).

SECTION 24. COURT REVIEW OF ORDERS

(a) This section relates to review by United States Circuit Courts of Appeal of orders of the Commission on the petition of any person aggrieved. On such review the court is to have exclusive jurisdiction to affirm, modify, and enforce or set aside the order, in whole or in part. Findings of fact by the Commission are to be conclusive if supported by substantial evidence. The judgment and decree of the court is to be final subject to review by the Supreme Court in accordance with sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code.

(b) The commencement of proceedings under subsection (a) is not to operate as a stay of the Commission's order unless the court so orders.

SECTION 25. UNLAWFUL REPRESENTATIONS

No action or failure to act by the Commission or Federal Reserve Board is to be construed to indicate approval of any security or transaction or to indicate a finding that any statement or report is true and accurate or not false or misleading. It is declared to be unlawful to make any representation that any such action or failure to act is to be so construed or has such effect.

SECTION 26. JURISDICTION OF OFFENSES AND SUITS

The district courts of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and the United States courts of any Territory or other place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States are given jurisdiction of violations of the act and of rules and regulations thereunder, and of suits in equity and actions at law brought to enforce any liability or duty created by the act or by the rules and regulations thereunder.

SECTION 27. EFFECT ON EXISTING LAW

(a) This subsection reserves rights and remedies existing outside of those provided in the act, but limits the total amount recoverable to the amount of actual damages. It provides that the jurisdiction of State commissions shall not be affected insofar as it does not conflict with the provisions of the act or the rules and regulations thereunder.

(b) It is provided that nothing in the act shall be construed to modify existing law with regard to certain relationships between exchanges and their members.

SECTION 28. VALIDITY OF CONTRACTS

(a) This subsection declares void any condition or stipulation requiring any person to waive compliance with any provision of the act or any rule or regulation thereunder or any rule of exchange.

(b) This subsection declares void contracts made in violation of the provisions of the act or the rules or regulations thereunder, and contracts made prior to the enactment of the act which involve the continuance of any relationship or practice prohibited by the act or any rule or regulation thereunder.

(c) This subsection includes provisions to negative any construction of the act which would affect the validity of loans and liens in certain cases. Cases are specified in which the act is to be construed to afford a defense to the collection of any debt or obligation or the enforcement of a lien.

SECTION 29. FOREIGN SECURITIES EXCHANGES

(a) This subsection makes it unlawful for brokers or dealers to use the mails or any instrumentality of interstate commerce to effect upon an exchange outside the United States transactions in securities of issuers who reside in or are organized under the laws of, or have their principal place of business in, the United States or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, in contravention of the rules and regulations of the Commission.

(b) It is provided that the act shall not apply to any person insofar as he transacts a business in securities outside the jurisdiction of the United States unless he transacts such business in contravention of the rules and regulations of the Commission prescribed to prevent evasion of the act.

SECTION 30. REGISTRATION FEES

An annual registration fee for exchanges is provided for in this section. Such fee is to be an amount equal to one five-hundredth of 1 percent of the aggregate dollar amount of the securities sales transacted on the exchange during the preceding calendar year. Amounts received as fees will be deposited in the Federal Treasury.

SECTION 31. MEMBERS AND EMPLOYEES OF FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

(a) This subsection provides for two additional members of the Federal Trade Commission. It authorizes the Commission to divide the members thereof into divisions (each to consist of not less than three members) and to direct that any of its functions arising under this act or any other provision of law may be assigned or referred to any such division. Provision is made for rehearing before the full Commission of decisions, orders, or other action by a division. A rehearing is not to suspend the operation of that division unless the Commission makes an order to that effect.

(b) For the purposes of this act and of the Securities Act of 1933 the Commission is authorized to employ and fix the compensation of attorneys, examiners, and other special experts without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States.

SECTION 32. PENALTIES

Penalties are provided for willful violation of the act or any rule or regulation thereunder the violation of which is expressly made unlawful, or for the making or causing to be made any statement in any application, report, or document filed under the act if such statement is false or misleading with respect to any material fact. The penalty provided is a fine of not more than $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both, except that when the violation is by an exchange a fine not to exceed $500,000 may be imposed.

SECTION 33. SEPARABILITY OF PROVISIONS

This section declares the policy of Congress that if any provision of the act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstance is held invalid the remainder of the act or the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

SECTION 34. EFFECTIVE DATE

The act is to take effect upon its enactment, except that certain of its provisions are to become effective July 1, 1934, and certain other provisions are to become effective on August 1, 1934.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I repeat what has been already said in appreciation of the work of our committee, which reported this bill, and particularly the immense amount of work our chairman, Mr. RAYBURN, has done. I think you will perceive from his remarks that at times he was a little worn by the number of people who wanted to see him, and by letters and telegrams he received. That is not strange. You will also agree, I think, that all the Members of Congress—I know it is true of all the members of the committee—have received an enormous number of telegrams and letters regarding the bill.

The chairman has characterized, and I suppose stigmatized all those communications as propaganda, but I think that if you have in mind the fact that by the best estimates we can get there are some 10,000,000 separate stockholders in the United States, and also that this bill directly and indirectly may affect every one of those 10,000,000 people, you will perceive why the bill has created a tremendous amount of interest throughout the United States and why the people have written in to their Congressmen.

I do not believe that the bulk of these communications have been brought about by anything except a legitimate desire of the people to protect their own property against undue depreciation.

It seems to me that it is not quite fair to the stockholders, these people seeking to protect their interests, to impute their action to unfair motives. I never have heard any objection to the farmers getting together to protect their own interests.

You doubtless appreciate that in the past 50 years the amount of liquid personal property in stocks and bonds in this country has increased tremendously, and very much to the advantage of the people of this country.

You will agree, I think, also, that while the so-called "panic of 1929" was largely connected with this personal property, and that while the blow-up was more evident on the stock exchange than anywhere else, the stock exchange was not primarily to blame.

You know, as any well-informed man knows, that these speculative eras and collapses afterward have been with us ever since civilization began and people have been possessed of personal property.

You will appreciate that stock exchanges have done a tremendous amount of good. If it had not been for the stock exchanges, which make capital liquid, which enable men to realize quickly on their holdings, the distress of the collapse would have been much greater.

You will all agree that more frozen assets of this country have been connected with real estate than they have with stocks.

I personally have not had very much business with the stock exchange, but I have known a great many people who have. I know that the New York Stock Exchange—that is credited with more of the evils than all the rest of them put together—I know that the business ethics are higher on that exchange than in the average business. It is conducted by word of mouth, and on honor, and violations of that honor are very rare.

I am not saying that there have not been abuses that should be corrected. What I am pleading for here is that in considering this legislation it should not be undertaken in any vindictive spirit. It should not be conducted with a notion that anybody who has made or may make a suggestion concerning the bill has been actuated by anything but an honest motive, and not by any propaganda.

In my own case, coming from New England, I have not been so much interested in the great corporations whose stocks are traded in on the New York Stock Exchange, and which become part of these great speculative movements, as I have in the smaller corporations and manufacturers who exist throughout New England and throughout the United States in general. I have not been so concerned with the regulation of stock-exchange practices, and I have not, as I said in my minority views, specially criticized the bill as a stock-exchange regulative bill, but I am concerned that the Commission which is set up under the bill should have such tremendous power over every manufacturing corporation and almost every other form of corporation in the country, and should have such tremendous power to regulate the care and management of these billions of liquid property in the United States.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I was under the impression from what the chairman of the committee, Mr. RAYBURN, said a few moments ago, that the smaller businesses were not affected by this bill if they did not deal on the listed-stock exchanges.

Mr. MERRITT. That is partly true, but the fact of the matter is that the Commission under this bill still has the power to force every corporation into some stock exchange. It also has the power to exempt them, and that was put in for the relief of these smaller corporations, and I think it is a very valuable feature of the bill, but, nonetheless, it is true that the Commission could act so that those small businesses would be bound to register on some exchange.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I rise to accentuate the statement of the gentleman that the Federal Trade Commission really can control and regulate the corporation whose securities are not on any listed exchange. Is not that so?

Mr. MERRITT. Rather indirectly, I think. I think it may make regulations which would force the small corporations to register their securities if the Commission so desired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Could it not also make regulations which would more or less limit their credit?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. And in the limitation of their credit they would have to do what the Commission required?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. So that the Commission could indirectly, under the bill, control every industry in the United States if it wanted to.

Mr. MERRITT. It could control the business in its securities.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. I believe the gentleman stated that the Commission could force these different businesses into the exchange?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Could it force the exchange to accept them? If it has the right to force the different businesses into an exchange, can it force the exchange to accept the different business interests?

Mr. MERRITT. It can force an exchange to become a national exchange if it wants to. It can exempt from the effects of the bill the smaller exchanges.

Mr. BLOOM. The exchange today needs to accept the different business interests it wants to list on the exchange. Is not that right?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. Suppose the exchange refuses to accept the business interests that the Commission would force into the exchange.

Mr. MERRITT. It could not do that, because they have to come in under general rules, and the general rules of all exchanges are subject to the Commission.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. I dislike to interrupt my friend, but the question which has been propounded to the gentleman from Connecticut is so vital and the country is so much interested in the question and the answer that I feel I should say that I do not interpret the bill as giving the Federal Trade Commission power to compel any corporation to list on any exchange.

Mr. MERRITT. Not directly; no.

Mr. MAPES. And the only provision in the bill that relates to small or local corporations in that respect, as I understand it, is the one in the over-the-counter market section, which gives the Federal Trade Commission authority in its regulations of the dealers and brokers in the over-the-counter markets to require that such dealers and brokers cease to handle the securities of any corporation unless they are listed with them, but in no case is a corporation required to so list unless it sees fit to do so. I say again I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him, but I think this is a very vital feature of the bill.

Mr. MERRITT. I think what I said before is correct, that the Commission could not do it directly; but I think if the bill is carefully read the gentleman will find that if the Commission starts out to do it by indirection it could either do that or else fix it so that the stock of any particular company could not be used as collateral, and would be very much depreciated.

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. THOM. Could the gentleman point out the particular sections in which he says this could be done?

Mr. MERRITT. It is in several sections, but I could not take time to do that in detail. The gentleman will either have to take my statement, or the statement of someone else.

Mr. THOM. I do not question the gentleman's statement. I wanted to refer to the language; that is all.

Mr. MERRITT. I am sorry, but I have not the time to take it up in detail. All the measures which have been taken by the administration in connection with this question have been in the first place to relieve the distress and in the second place to relieve the depression. Undoubtedly some good results have followed, but not in all cases. We hear great dissatisfaction with the A.A.A. and a good deal over the N.R.A. The one certain result of all these measures, which I am not intending to criticize at all, has been an enormous increase in the public debt, which the President estimates at the end of the fiscal year 1935 will amount to over three thousand million dollars, with an annual interest charge of one thousand million dollars.

Now, in order that these temporary measures may really be temporary, it is, of course, essential that business should be revived. There are some signs now of revived business. My impression is that if the Nation could be assured of quiet, business would of itself revive on a sound foundation, which can only come from individual initiative and individual work. It is universally agreed also that the only sound foundation for reviving business must be in the purchase of capital goods; that is, goods for future useful work. All these enormous expenditures on public buildings produce demand for the material which goes into the buildings, but after the buildings are constructed they do not add to employment except in the care of the buildings, and they do add to the expense of maintenance by the Government.

Now, for the purchase of capital goods, and indeed for business in general, the first essential is confidence. It is very generally thought by business men and writers on economics that the Security Registration Act which was passed at the last session of this Congress has been very detrimental. It had a great many severe provisions with regard to underwriters, with regard to directors, and putting on them responsibilities and liabilities which drove a great many of them out of business and prevented new securities being issued. I do not mean to say that the lack of issuing new securities has been altogether due to that act, but I do say it has been a large factor. In this act we should be careful not to overdo it. The difficulty with all acts like this is that those who write them are so intent on punishing a few guilty people that they overlook the fact that they are really punishing still more, a greater percentage of honest people. In all corporations there are a certain number of selfish men who will endeavor to feather their own nests at the expense of the corporation or of their fellow stockholders, but, after all, those men are a very small percentage. The time has not yet come when great corporations or any corporations can get along without character and without brains. The difficulty with the Securities Registration Act and with this act, to my mind, is that it is so filled with directions and regulations which are indefinite and uncertain, and cannot be enforced. That was illustrated, for instance, by the colloquy between the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] and myself. We have both been working on this bill for weeks, and the gentleman from Michigan thinks it produces one result and I think it produces another. There can be no doubt that the result from the Securities Registration Act, and the result from this act, will be that responsible people, a great many thousands of directors of corporations, will be forced out of those corporations. These men go on boards of directors not because they want to but because they are known in their communities, and their services are sought after because they are men of judgment and character. Such men are not going on those boards to make money on the stock, and if by going on a board of directors they are going to subject themselves to suits by any blackmailer that comes along, they will not go on. The result is that the corporation will not be formed or you will have boards of directors and managements not as able as you would wish.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Undoubtedly there is considerable opinion in the House for a change in the bill which grants this authority to the Federal Trade Commission. Many Members of the House, and I am one of them, would like to see a different form of commission set up, by the enactment of legislation. I am wondering if the gentleman contemplates presenting an amendment that, for instance, would provide a commission composed of a member of the Federal Reserve Board, a member of the Federal Trade Commission, and one or two members from the stock exchange, members who would know all about this very complicated machinery which operates the exchanges?

Mr. MERRITT. The gentleman perhaps knows that the bill as reported by the Senate committee provides for a separate commission.

Mr. BRITTEN. The Senate bill provides for a purely political commission, three Democrats and two Republicans.

Mr. MERRITT. I think so.

Mr. BRITTEN. My thought is that that would be just as bad as the provisions in this act now before the House. I have been much impressed with the testimony before the gentleman's committee, to the effect that a distinctly non-partisan, nonpolitical commission of some sort should be established, and there should be upon that commission one or two men who know every angle of the operations of the stock exchanges of this country.

Mr. MERRITT. I agree with the gentleman, and if he will allow me, I will give him better authority than perhaps either he or I, for that statement. This whole legislation came from a commission which was appointed by President Roosevelt and headed by Mr. Dickinson, who is Assistant Secretary of Commerce. That commission made a report, and this bill follows that report. I regret to say that Mr. Dickinson was not a member of the committee which drew the bill, but his letter to the President, which finally resulted in the drawing of the bill, has this phrase:

Should it be determined that a separate commission should be set up, such commission should be composed of at least three members without regard to political affiliations, appointed for a term of at least 7 years.

Now, this is the point:

In either case it is suggested that one of the members of the commission or authority should be required by law to be a man thoroughly experienced in stock-exchange practices.

I think the longer the committee considered this bill the more the members were impressed with the feeling of its enormous importance and the enormous interests which will be affected by the bill.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. BEEDY. Is the gentleman going to offer an amendment embracing the suggestions made by the gentleman from Illinois and Mr. DICKINSON?

Mr. MERRITT. I think it will be offered. I do not know that I shall offer it.

Mr. BEEDY. Is there such amendment to be offered, within your knowledge?

Mr. MERRITT. I think it should be.

Mr. BEEDY. I think it should be, too; but I wanted to know whether anybody representing the committee can tell me whether there is such an amendment to be presented.

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman refers to the separate authority or commission?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes; I am going to offer such an amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina to state to the House the substance of the amendment the gentleman proposes to offer?

Mr. BULWINKLE. In substance it will empower the President to appoint 3 men to serve for 2, 4, and 6 years, 2 of one political party and 1 of another.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman from Connecticut will yield further, my thought is that instead of the President naming three gentlemen of the political parties—and, of course, any commissioner named by the President would be a high type of man—that at least one member of the commission should be thoroughly qualified and experienced in the manipulations of the stock exchanges.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Answering the gentleman from Illinois, I may say that I do not think any President ought to be tied down to the selection of a man from any certain group.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise to suggest in the legislation that at least one man should be thoroughly experienced in the manipulation of stock exchanges?

Mr. BULWINKLE. No; I do not.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, I submit this matter can be cleared up in debate without using too much of my time.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman stated that the Securities Act was handicapping industry in obtaining loans; and the gentleman's position on this stock-exchange bill, as I understood it, will further aggravate that condition.

Mr. MERRITT. I did not mean to say in obtaining loans. What I said was that the Securities Act and this act will retard good men from going on boards of directors.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that it makes it difficult for companies to finance their present needs by the issue of securities?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes; I think it does.

Mr. CULKIN. And is it not also a fact that at the present time it is difficult, if not almost impossible, for an industry of normal size to get loans from banks?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. This act has nothing to do with the original issue of securities?

Mr. MERRITT. No; it only aggravates the difficulty; that is all.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield for a short question.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The gentleman remarked that it was difficult to get good men to serve on boards of directors.

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. The gentleman predicates that statement upon the fact that members of boards are held responsible for the activities of their corporations?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Therefore, the director who does not attend to business on the board becomes a bad man instead of a good man, and ought to be kept off the board.

Mr. MERRITT. Well, that is a little casuistry into which I will not go.

In closing I call the attention of the committee to the letter of the President addressed to the chairman of our committee on March 26, in which the President said in the paragraph summing up his letter:

We must, of course, prevent insofar as possible manipulation of prices to the detriment of actual investors; but at the same time we must eliminate unnecessary, unwise, and destructive speculation.

This sentence, you see, applies to stock-exchange practices. I cannot criticize the provisions of this bill in that regard especially, but I do think the bill goes beyond the expressed sentiments of the President. I think it will tend to continue the unsettled state of mind of business men and manufacturers so that they will not be willing to make forward contracts; they will not be willing to buy capital goods and contract to furnish capital goods because they cannot tell at what moment the Commission may decide to change its rules, may decide to put some increased burden on their corporation, may decide to make some new regulation of the stock exchanges which will freeze what ought to be their liquid assets.

This bill has been drawn with the greatest care; and I suppose that with the knowledge we have now it may be considered a good bill to cover these subjects, if we want to cover them; but I still doubt if there is a man on our committee who has been studying this subject who would be willing to say with certainty what the bill will do in very many directions.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MERRITT. I think, therefore, the part of wisdom, as I have suggested in the minority report, would be to allow this bill to sleep. Perfect it by debate, yes; give the Members an opportunity to debate, to state their own opinions, and hear the opinions of others, but allow the enactment of the bill to wait until the next Congress. It is only 7 months before another Congress will meet; and, surely, nothing is going to happen in that time; there is not going to be any destructive speculation. I think it will be the part of much greater wisdom to let the bill go over another 6 months instead of risking the enactment of a bad law which will be difficult to remove from the statute books once it is enacted.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I understood the gentleman to say that the ethics of the business of the country were not as high as the ethics of the New York Stock Exchange. Is that correct?

Mr. MERRITT. No; that is not what I said, although I did say practically that. I said that business as conducted on the New York Stock Exchange is conducted on a higher and better ethical standard than many other businesses.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman, of course, has read the investigation of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee along that line?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. What can the gentleman say with regard to his comparison in view of what was developed by that committee?

Mr. MERRITT. The report of the Senate committee related to a very few individuals on an exchange.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman said that the national debt will reach something more than $30,000,000,000. I would like to know how much of that is actual and how much is in the form of revolving funds that will come back to the Government?

Mr. MERRITT. I cannot answer questions of detail and they do not affect my point.

Mr. KELLER. I have been trying to find that out.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss in detail the provisions of this bill, but rather to touch upon a few matters which have occurred to me during its consideration in the committee as being extraordinarily important.

When the gentleman from Connecticut states that the committee worked hard, he stated the truth, and when he stated that the chairman of the committee had been hard driven he sated the truth. It has been a big task, and for one I take my hat off to the chairman of the committee for the manner in which he has stood up under the pressure exerted upon him from all sides. At the same time I do not think we should belittle the concern that a very, very large number of people scattered all over the country have felt about this measure, and I think we can get a better understanding of this concern if we go back and look for a moment at the bill as it was originally introduced. It was a very different proposition than the one now confronting us.

The bill as originally introduced was not drawn under the auspices of the so-called "Roper committee", but by another group selected for the purpose, and the selection was not made by the members of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. That first bill was calculated to throw fear not only into the minds of brokers and dealers and those engaged in the marketing of securities, but into the minds of bankers and security owners all over the country, and those who are responsible for the management of great business enterprises. I think we ought to review for just a moment some of the things which that bill proposed to do, in order that we may understand the fear that spread over the country and the actual harm that was done by the destruction of confidence. Of course, not all will agree with me in my criticism of the original proposal. But, for example, in the original bill the margin requirement was to be 60 percent. The best informed people in the United States, as we have encountered them, or at least as I have encountered them, were thoroughly convinced that if that provision were frozen in the law we would embark upon another painful period of deflation.

Various errors were committed, probably unintentionally. For example, the first bill forbade dealing in convertible bonds on the stock exchange. This happily has been corrected. The first bill, as I recollect, would have compelled the separation of the broker-dealer business, and in this event nearly every small broker in the country would have been driven out of business, because he would have been forbidden to do any business as a dealer. It was perfectly apparent that the small house cannot live, cannot command enough income unless it is permitted under proper regulation to do both kinds of business. That very provision is the one that started a great deal of this campaign of opposition to the bill as a whole, for if it had gone into effect literally thousands of employees in broker-dealer houses throughout the country would have lost their places.

Under the original bill it was not definitely clear that a State bond was to be put in the exempt class, as was provided for United States bonds or obligations. This, of course, caused concern at the seat of every State government and was of special concern to those who make a specialty of dealing in municipal and State bonds. Their number, of course, is very large. That needed clarification.

As to the reports to be required from corporations desiring to list their stocks, there were some extraordinary provisions in the first measure introduced, and, as though to cover everything in case anything should be forgotten, the Federal Trade Commission was authorized to require any kind of report that it saw fit to ask for. Furthermore, the Commission was charged with the initial function of granting permission for the listing of the securities on the exchange. In other words, the exchanges, in the first place, would have nothing to say about the matter; the Commission alone would pass judgment on the proposal to list a given security. That very thing, with the extraordinary report required under the first draft of this measure, would have centered here in the Federal Trade Commission a very practical control over all the corporations in the country whose securities might be listed upon any exchange.

The same is true with respect to the first draft concerning the accounts or the method of keeping accounts which these same corporations might be required to adopt under orders from the Commission. As we all know, hundreds and hundreds of utilities must keep their accounts in accordance with the laws of the State in which they operate and under which they are regulated. To authorize a commission here in Washington to prescribe a different form of keeping accounts would, of course, impose a tremendous expense on those companies, and to no public benefit. Naturally, they were nervous. The keeping of accounts now under the various State laws is a highly expensive piece of business. Of course, it must be done, but most of these companies are having a hard enough time to get along, and any unnecessary or additional expense is something to be avoided. We cured that in the final redraft of the bill.

Then, as to the publicity of this information which the Commission was authorized under the previous draft to gather in, there was grave doubt as to the wisdom of the publicity section, because under a certain construction of this section the trade secrets and business practices of all these concerns might be given out to the public or made available to the public—practices and secrets which have nothing whatsoever to do with dealing in securities on stock exchanges. In the first draft the bill went so far beyond the mere regulation of stock exchanges that it is not surprising that it attracted national interest rather than simply so-called "Wall Street" interest.

My experience with those who have protested against certain provisions of this bill as originally introduced has been a very informing one.

I confess I knew nothing about the practices of stock exchanges, never having come in contact with them in a single instance. In the hearings, it is true, three fourths of the time was consumed by critics of the bill, but in nearly every instance those who criticized the bill expressed the hope we would get a good bill regulating the dealing in securities.

I remember very well that the representatives of the Curb Exchange came before the committee and pointed out that under the provisions of the bill as then drafted there was no question whatsoever but that the Curb Exchange in New York must close. Do you blame them for coming to us and protesting? This has been cured in the redraft.

I can also remember the original proxy provisions as contained in the bill first introduced. They provided, for example, that any person soliciting proxies from a shareholder in a company must at the same time furnish such shareholder with a complete list of all the other shareholders in the company. This would be an extraordinary undertaking for the Pennsylvania Railroad, with its over 100,000 shareholders, or the American Telegraph & Telephone Co., with its 680,000 shareholders, living in all 48 States and in 80 foreign countries. Every one of them would have had to receive from the corporation's headquarters three volumes, each as large as the Washington telephone directory, with every name and address of the shareholders printed in the volume. Is it strange that we have had opposition and criticism? This has been cured to a very considerable degree in the redraft of the bill.

My experience has been very pleasant in having these things pointed out and teaching me, and I think they have taught us a great deal more than we ever knew before about the business of the United States.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Not for a question but merely an expression of the hope that the gentleman, while he has the floor, will point out to what extent the bill now under consideration has eliminated these objectionable features so that we may know the merit of the bill as it is at present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think I shall.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. A moment ago the gentleman spoke about section 11, which is the report section, and the gentleman stated he thought we had cured that. We have modified it, but I call the gentleman's attention to page 34, beginning with the word "except" in line 18, where we find these words:

Except that this provision shall not be construed to prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements with respect to such reports, within the scope of this section and section 11.

Now, section 11 is the report section, so that while we have modified the bill, yet it does give the Federal Trade Commission the power to impose any additional requirements on reports that it may see fit to make.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. But it states that the Commission cannot go further than the requirements of section 11.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Section 11 is the report section.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; that is a limitation.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Then the bill says that the Commission has power to impose additional requirements with respect to such reports within the scope of this section and section 11.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Ohio is correct. While modifications were made in this so-called "report section", and I think rather important modifications, there still does reside in the Federal Trade Commission the power which the gentleman from Ohio has mentioned.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BEEDY. Does not the gentleman still consider that very provision leaves the business interests affected laboring under great fear and doubt as to the possibilities of future regulations that may be imposed?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will answer that question in this way. When I said the provision has been modified, the enumeration of the subjects to be covered in the reports required has been shortened. Some things that the committee believed were utterly unnecessary and put in merely for annoyance purposes have been eliminated. I regret myself that the sentence which the gentleman from Ohio has just read was put in the measure. It was put in after another modification had been made, which we thought was to be the final modification.

Mr. MAPES and Mr. PETTENGILL rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield first to the gentleman from Michigan, my colleague on the committee.

Mr. MAPES. I think perhaps it would be interesting to state here the theory of the sentence to which the gentleman has referred. It is recognized, I think, that some of the States do not require utility corporations to make very complete reports, and one of the purposes of this legislation is to protect investors by requiring informative reports, and this provision was put in so as to make it clear that the Federal Trade Commission, if it thought enough information was not being given to afford investors an opportunity to pass intelligently upon the value of the securities, could call for additional information, not inconsistent with what the State law required.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. When the gentleman referred to the power of the Federal Trade Commission a moment ago, I thought the gentleman referred to it with regard to the accountancy section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was talking about the accountancy section; yes.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. And was referring to the terrific expense that might be involved if new and different systems of accountancy were required and was not referring specifically to the section with regard to mere reports.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The language to which attention has been called is part of what might be called the accountancy paragraph.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. If the gentleman will permit, I cannot agree with my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES]. The bill does not say anything about this last provision applying to States that require no system of accounting. The language is, "shall not be construed to prevent the Commission from imposing such additional requirements with respect to such reports", as they may need. It may be that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] is right, but I do not read it in that way. It seems to me to give the Commission broad powers to establish any additional requirements they want with respect to section 11, which is the report section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The inaccuracy of my analysis of this particular section is due to something I must confess. I think I am not violating the rules of the committee. I offered an amendment myself inserting, on page 34, line 15, the words "or any State", so as to relieve corporations which are required by State laws to keep their accounts in a certain way from being required by the Federal Trade Commission to keep them in another way. At the next meeting of the committee I was absent and the sentence to which the gentleman from Ohio has called attention was inserted, although the amendment which I had proposed in the first instance was accepted.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. We were discussing that day accepting the additional language, and I remember we agreed to put in the words as to the States qualifying the language.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Undoubtedly the gentleman's recollection is accurate, but unfortunately I was absent that day from the committee. I simply mentioned that to explain my ignorance of the sentence read by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MAPES. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. I did not mean to state, if I did so state, that any State did not require some sort of a report to be made by utility corporations. All I said was that some did not require very complete or enlightening reports, and this sentence to which the gentleman has been referring simply invests the Federal Trade Commission, if it sees fit, with the power to call for additional information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have been asked to find out where the modifications are which make the bill a better measure than the original one.

We will start with the marginal requirements. Under the original bill it was 60 percent. Most people thought that would bring a deflation and place the country in a worse condition than it is today. That has been reduced to 45 percent. Or he can borrow 100 percent of its lowest market price during the preceding 36 calendar months, but in no case more than 75 percent of the current market price. If I had my way, I would make the first alternative 40 percent instead of 45 percent.

Now, we are dealing with a very delicate thing when we deal with margins. We cannot tell here in the House of Representatives what is going to happen in the next 3 months or the next 6 months or the next year with respect to the demand for securities, the demand of the public for securities for investment as well as speculation.

I should have preferred that the whole provision be left absolutely flexible with the Federal Reserve Board to keep its hand on the situation. But the committee finally decided to write their formula into the statute. The Senate bill does not contain the formula, but leaves it to the Federal Reserve Board.

As I am informed—I may not be correct about it—that is substantially the way that it is done in London. Instead of the Federal Reserve Board, the control is by the Bank of England.

It is further modified by the fact that the bill gives the Federal Reserve Board the right to change the formula if it deems it wise so to do for the benefit of trade and commerce and so forth.

I suppose there will always remain in the minds of the Federal Reserve Board the fact that the Congress has written the formula, and it will take quite a situation to persuade the Board to abandon the formula and substitute its own regulation. It would be a matter of courage. Generally those decisions have to be made, if made at all, under very stressful conditions; but if we are to trust government at all, I should think we could trust the Federal Reserve Board to rise to the occasion with respect to changing margin conditions.

Instead of separating broker-dealer concerns and forcing segregation and putting any number of them out of business, this bill permits broker-dealers to continue in business under regulations fixed by the Federal Trade Commission, and implies that a study shall be made of that to see what the developments may be and whether further legislation is necessary.

State bonds and municipal bonds are now definitely placed in the exempt clause by this bill.

As I said, the proxy provision has been toned down, and although I regard the section as absolutely unnecessary, having nothing to do with the regulation of stock exchanges, I suppose it can be said that it is not going to impose much hardship or annoyance on anybody.

I hesitate to bring up a constitutional question. This bill, I assume, is founded upon the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. There is a long argument in the first two pages of the bill. In fact section 2 is a speech, and I would advise you all to read it. I have never seen anything quite like it proposed in legislation. It starts by stating that certain things are important and certain things are evil, and then goes on to say that the important things should be handled and the evil things should be prevented, and it ends up with an exhortation that the whole thing is the right thing to do and is well within the provisions of the Constitution, or words to that effect. That, of course, is designed to control the Supreme Court. If I had my way, as a matter of bill drafting, I would strike it out. It has no place in a statute of the United States. You do not put your arguments in statutes; you put your arguments in the reports of the committee or you make them on the floor of the House or the Senate.

May I now call the attention of Members to one matter which has been one of deep concern to me, although, perhaps, not so to many others. This bill imposes a marginal requirement not only upon brokers and dealers but also upon all bankers. That establishes in my view a new thought and a new principle in the treatment of bankers and banks under a statute of the United States. Under this bill a banker may not loan to one of his customers more than 55 percent of the market value of the stock which that customer is purchasing and wants to carry with the aid of the loan.

We are speaking now, of course, of listed securities. The same provision, of course, applies to the broker. He may not lend more than 55 percent. I can very well understand how a statute controlling the broker in this regard is defensible, and I make no complaint against it, but I have my doubts as to the soundness of having these margin provisions apply to all the banks. A broker, when he makes a loan to a customer, makes little or no inquiry as to the customer's financial standing, otherwise than connected with the collateral he puts up. Of course, in most instances he does not see the customer, as the orders come in by telegraph very often. He makes no inquiry as to the customer's character or standing in the community, or as to his other assets. He does not inform himself as to the nature of the customer's business. Those things do not interest the broker. All he must do is to comply with the rules of the exchange or the statute of the United States, as the case may be, with respect to the customer's margin; but when the customer of a bank goes to that bank, known to the president of the bank, to the directors of the bank, as a man of substance and standing in the community, and proposes that the bank make him a loan with which he may purchase a listed security and carry it with the aid of the loan, and the banker knows with whom he is talking and knows about the man's other assets and about his character and all about his business, how long he has been living in the town, all about his family, as he will, if he is anything like a wise banker, then the banker may be doing a perfectly sound thing, a perfectly safe thing, a thing which will aid in a small way the business transactions of the town, if he should loan to that man on a smaller margin than 45 percent. Yet this law is to step in between the individual customer and his own banker, whether that banker be in Oshkosh or Wichita, or some place in Montana, or in Texas, or in New York City.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. In the case the gentleman describes, if the man is a man of such standing as he describes, the banker could make a loan without this collateral security, or he could also make a loan to that extent, 45 percent, and then make a separate loan for an amount that he believes this man is entitled to receive. Is not that true? So that there is no danger of that provision at all.

Mrs. KAHN. That would be a direct evasion of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, of course the question propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], if answered in the affirmative—and I do not know that I am competent to answer it either in the affirmative or in the negative—but if answered in the affirmative, and that answer were taken as true, means that this section is not worth anything. If it is to be evaded that easily, why have it at all with respect to banks?

I may be somewhat old fashioned in my regard for the function of a banker. I do not like to see him put in the same category as the broker. I think the banker is expected to use judgment, and the broker is not expected to use judgment to anything like the same extent in making loans.

I know my suggestion will not be and cannot be carried out; that is, to take the banks entirely out of this margin provision. That was discussed in committee, and it was decided otherwise. I dread it somewhat. I believe it will cramp the style, if I may use that phrase, of prospective investors away back in the hinterland, who want to go to their county banks and make loans, who cannot put up any such amount of collateral, or it would cause great hardship upon them if compelled to do so, as is imposed by this statute. I would rather trust the judgment of the banker who is well acquainted with his customer than I would the law.

Mr. DARDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. DARDEN. Does this limitation apply as between banks?

For instance, in my section there is a large number of small banks which operate seasonally and borrow from central banks, and at that time they hypothecate security. Would it apply to those banks?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It applies to all banks and to all persons and all corporations, all partnerships, all associations, and joint-stock companies, between themselves, or as an original transaction.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MILLIGAN. That only applies when they desire to buy securities?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is right. It is only for loans made to carry a security on an exchange, but, of course, that in itself is a tremendous field.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If a banker made a loan, as suggested by the gentleman a few moments ago, to an individual who was not only entitled to a loan of 45 percent but to a greater loan, if the intent of this law is such that the banker is supposed to have a 45-percent margin, and he loans a greater amount than that, the banker would be liable for neglect of duty if he did not require 45-percent margin against the loan?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, of course, the banker violates the law if he fails to require the 45-percent margin.

Mr. RICH. And the bank would be guilty of an offense?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. In case the purchase of stock is entirely financed by a banker, in case it goes sour, who gets the sour end, the banker or the broker?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The man who makes the loan is the man who violates the law, as I understand it.

Mr. BLACK. But they are both within the law. It can be financed 100 percent, within the law, by borrowings.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not under this bill.

Mr. BLACK. Not under this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not under this bill.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COLE. Is there very much difference in the provision we are discussing, section 6 of the present bill, and the power which the Federal Reserve Board already has under the Glass-Steagall bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the object of including banks is to prevent the use of bank credit in support of wild speculation. As it is described, the "sucking in", through channels of the banks, of the available credit reserves of the country, in support of speculation on the exchanges. The evil, which I suppose existed to a greater or lesser degree, but I do not know how great, was in the mind of the men of this House and of the Senate when the Glass-Steagall bill was passed at the extra session. There was inserted in the Glass-Steagall bill a provision to this effect—I am paraphrasing it, of course—that if the Federal Reserve Board or a Federal Reserve bank in a district made up its mind that one of the banks in that district was loaning too much money on the stock market, it could say to that bank in effect, "Taper down; taper down. Call some of those loans. Stop that. If you do not, if you persist, we will deny you the rediscount privilege at the Federal Reserve bank."

Now, that provision was designed to prevent the very evil which this inclusion of banks in the margin provision of this bill is designed to prevent. My contention is that the Glass-Steagall bill accomplishes the purpose. The Glass-Steagall bill will control, as to its volume, the amount of bank loans used for speculative purposes on the exchange. Volume will be controlled, but in this bill we go between the individual borrower and the banker, which I think is unnecessary.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COLE. I agree with the gentleman that the Glass-Steagall bill, exercised by the Federal Reserve bank, would accomplish the same purpose. Of course, the gentleman knows the Glass-Steagall Act does not cover nonmember banks.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true; but I think they are finally going to come under the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. COLE. If the gentleman is satisfied with the provisions of the Glass-Steagall bill, the opinion of Governor Black, of the Federal Reserve bank, should have a great weight with him; he approves the provisions of section 6.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know he does. It takes some recklessness on my part to disagree with him.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. If the provisions of the Glass-Steagall Act applicable to member banks is good legislation with regard to member banks, why should not this legislation prove to be good with regard to the operations of nonmember banks?

Mr. WADSWORTH. This legislation is different in this respect, it steps in between the individual customer and his banker.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes; I appreciate that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the Glass-Steagall bill there is nothing of the sort. That bill steps between the bank and the speculative market and says to the bank: "Your volume of loans is too great; cut it down." It does not say to the banker, however, that he must cut John Smith's loan down or Bill Jones' loan; it simply says that he has too much money loaned and that he must cut it down. I think the provisions of that act will accomplish the purpose Congress had in mind then and the purpose it has in mind now.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. The Glass-Steagall bill prohibits the association of broker and dealer in the banking business. A few moments ago the gentleman said that this bill would permit them to resume their old operations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The brokers and dealers?

Mr. RICH. The Glass-Steagall bill prohibited that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Glass-Steagall bill did not touch that subject at all.

Mr. RICH. I do not know whether I understood the full meaning of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; I misspoke myself, if I said anything like that.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman draw a distinction as to the character of collateral?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania. There are common stock, preferred stock, and bonds. Should there not be a different margin requirement according to the nature of the security?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think there should be, and that is why I believe in complete flexibility. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. Ford].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to discuss the details of the bill, but shall make just a few observations on the broader aspects of it.

No more controversial measure has been before this House than H.R. 9323, known as the "securities exchange bill of 1934."

The bill as first written brought down an avalanche of criticism and objections. It is my conviction that the bill as first drawn was too drastic. Therefore, much of the criticism of that first draft has proved to be justified.

But extended public hearings have been held. Every objection has been given careful consideration. Revision after revision has been made with the purpose of eliminating the provisions that seemed to be too drastic.

Now, I think, we have a bill that will protect the public by preventing inequitable and unfair practices and that will in the end prove beneficial to legitimate operators on our stock exchanges.

This bill does three things. It protects investors, controls market manipulations that are destructive to values, and tends to curb destructive speculation.

This measure strikes directly at what I believe is the most vicious practice of the stock exchanges—that is, the making of what is known as “wash sales” and “matched orders.” This kind of manipulation is on a par with the use of loaded dice or other devices utilized by crooked professional gamblers in the conduct of their profession. It is, however, more reprehensible. No sane man enters a gambling house expecting to get a fair break for his money. But hundreds of thousands of good, honest American citizens pay their money to brokers, thinking that they are dealing with conservative, responsible, business men who are affording them the facilities of the market on an even chance with all others who use the market for the purpose of buying and selling securities. These people think they are investing their money in legitimate securities. That should be the case. If this measure is enacted into law, I believe that will be the case henceforth.

I hold no brief for those who would deliberately interfere with or hamper legitimate business. On the other hand, I insist that since the stock market has in the past been guilty of practices that transcend the legitimate, they, as well as all other offenders, should be brought within the law that calls for an honest, fair, and open chance for the citizen who desires to invest his money in legitimate securities. If in so doing he loses through the natural or ordinary hazard in industry and commerce, that is a loss he is willing to take. But if he is sheared like a lamb through a rigged market, through manipulations resulting from wash sales and matched orders, he has a legitimate cause for complaint, and it is his Government's business, through its legislative and executive branches, to throw about this stock-purchasing and stock-selling business such safeguards as will make these tricky devices, so long indulged in, impossible in the future.

This is a measure that President Roosevelt strongly recommends. In the face of the terrific drive against the measure, the President has repeated his recommendations. He is acting in the interest of honest business and honest investors. His motives are the highest. Shall we listen to the uninformed protestors or to the special interests who are objecting to this bill? Or shall we follow the leadership of the best friend the people of the United States ever had? Let us have the courage to pass this bill, knowing that it is an honest bill, framed for the benefit of honest people. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I take this minute merely for the purpose of answering the gentleman from California.

We have plenty of laws in New York against wash sales and matched orders; and we have the provisions of the United States mail fraud law against the same thing. We do not need this bill to give that particular protection. I do not think the gentleman will find anyone who has lost money recently on the New York Stock Exchange because of wash sales or matched orders.

Mr. FORD. Not recently; but how about the past?

Mr. BLACK. That may have been the case years and years ago.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as there are no further requests for time this afternoon from Members on either side, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 9323) to provide for the regulation of securities exchanges and of over-the-counter markets operating in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to prevent inequitable and unfair practices on such exchanges and markets, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

GILBERT DU MOTIER, MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a report to accompany House Concurrent Resolution No. 37, providing for a joint session of the two Houses of Congress for appropriate exercises in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the death of Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de La Fayette (Rept. No. 1412), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FORMULATION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a report to accompany House Joint Resolution 265, providing for the preparation and completion of plans for a comprehensive observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formulation of the Constitution of the United States (Rept. No. 1413), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

A CENTURY OF PROGRESS

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to insert in the Record a letter from the President of the United States to the Congress under date of March 27, 1934, in relation to the Century of Progress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following letter from the President of the United States to the Congress under date of March 27, 1934, in relation to the Century of Progress:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Commission to the end that legislation may be enacted extending the availability of funds previously appropriated for Government participation in A Century of Progress, the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration, in 1933, to June 30, 1935, and also authorizing the appropriation of funds in the amount of $405,000 for the purpose of defraying the expenses of participation by the Government of the United States in the reopening of A Century of Progress, the Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration, in 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1934.

PROF. ALBERT EINSTEIN

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record and to include therein an address delivered in Chicago April 8, 1934.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the Record, I include the following address delivered by me at the National Conference of the Committee on Defense of Human Rights, held in Chicago, Ill., on Sunday, April 8, 1934:

Mr. Chairman and delegates, the privilege accorded me of attending your conference is profoundly appreciated, and it is with a keen feeling of pleasure that I have come to join you, but equally keen is my sense of regret that it is necessary for liberty-loving Americans in this twentieth century to gather in assembly in aid of the protection of minorities and the defense of human rights. Fortunately, we, in America, now enjoy, as in the beginning, the happiness, freedom, and liberty guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States. The United States of America still is, and may it ever be, known in the world as a “haven of liberty and true civilization.”

In the present Congress there is pending the measure which has become entitled “House Joint Resolution 309”: A resolution to admit Dr. Albert Einstein to American citizenship. The measure which I was privileged to introduce in the House of Representatives in Washington is intended to confer upon the "most eminent of the eminent" the greatest honor in the gift of the country—her citizenship.

Reads the simple document:

"Whereas Prof. Albert Einstein has been accepted by the scientific world as a savant and genius; and

"Whereas his activities as a humanitarian have placed him high in the regard of countless of his fellowmen; and

"Whereas he has publicly declared on many occasions to be a lover of the United States and an admirer of its Constitution; and

"Whereas the United States is known in the world as a "haven of liberty and true civilization": Therefore be it Resolved, By the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Albert Einstein is hereby unconditionally admitted to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States."

As a United States Representative from New Jersey, I have felt that in honoring such a great man as Professor Einstein, the American people would be doing no more or less than honoring themselves. We like his greatness. We admire his genius. We cherish his humility. He came to us by choice; we choose to have him always if we can. He is imbued with the American principles of liberty; he has all the attributes of a true American; he has brought prestige and fame to America.

The United States has previously bestowed honors upon him. Our country, along with many others, has competed for his genius. He has finally come to us, to our land of liberty, has "this most illustrious scientist since Isaac Newton, one of the most appealing personalities of the world." He will be with us the greater part of the time, although he will leave us temporarily each year to impart his learning at institutions in other countries. He is of the world. But who shall gainsay that he does not now rightfully belong to America?

"My political idea is democracy," he has said. And further, "I believe that you in the United States have hit upon the right idea. You choose a President for a reasonable length of time and give him enough power to acquit himself properly of his responsibilities."

In the many expressions of this great mathematician and genius there is food for thought. Once knowing his simple, honest, sympathetic manner as gleaned from his life and work, nothing that he has said or done can fairly be misconstrued.

I have read his comment on the horrors of war and the virtues of peace. It brought echoes of what Sherman said of war. It revived in memory the ejaculations of many World War veterans, friends of mine, who, after the armistice, said, "No more war", thinking aloud, but yet ready to resume hostilities at the sound of the country's bugle. I have listened to the words of Theodore Roosevelt fame, "We must have peace", and then more emphatically, "We must have peace; but if we must have war to gain peace, then we must war for the sake of peace." Devoutly committed to the cause of international peace, I have heard the genius Einstein denounce war—as most have at one time or another—and still I have seen the great humanitarian hasten to the defense of the people of his race militantly when they were in jeopardy, and I have marked his devotion to the cause of liberty—"liberty without which," he said, "life to a self-respecting man is not worth living."

In a great speech in Albert Hall, London, England, October 4, 1933, Dr. Einstein spoke of the blessings of freedom, saying: "We are concerned not merely with the technical problem of securing and maintaining peace but also with the important tasks of education and enlightenment. If we want to resist the powers which threaten to suppress intellectual and individual freedom, we must keep clearly before us what is at stake and what we owe to that freedom which our ancestors won for us after hard struggles."

"Without such freedom there would have been no Shakespeare, no Goethe, Newton, Faraday, Pasteur, or Lister. There would be no comfortable houses for the mass of the people, no railways or wireless, no protection against epidemics, no cheap books, no culture, no enjoyment of art for all. There would be no machines to relieve people from the arduous labor needed for the production of the essential necessities of life. Most people would lead a dull life of slavery just as under the ancient despotisms of Asia. It is only men who are free who create the inventions and intellectual works which to us moderns make life worthwhile."

As becomes a scientist, he has discoursed on the scientific and has turned from science to religion—to the supernatural. I have pictured him as he reflected upon the great mystery, with what seemed to me a searching mind, yet fervid heart. My study of his writings brought me back to the saintly Newman to recall his perplexities, which emerged triumphant in Lead Kindly Light. I saw Einstein perplexed, but religious, though tolerant. I peeked, I thought, into the inner recesses of his heart and his mind; and I saw there, as I believe, one of the Godliest of men.

An adherent to the principles of social justice, he has expressed himself vigorously on behalf of the masses—as have many of our leading statesmen—and in that characteristic we find, and find only, the great humanitarian.

He is living immortal in our midst.

Professor Einstein has accepted a life appointment at the Institute for Advanced Study. It was established by the generosity of two lovable philanthropists of my State of New Jersey—Mrs. Felix Fuld and her brother, Mr. Louis Bamberger, of Newark. It has, as you may know, temporary quarters in Fine Hall, Graduate Mathematical Building, at Princeton University. Dr. and Mrs.

Einstein are residing now in Princeton, where they are the recipients of the love and affection of the people of my State. The State of New Jersey feels honored by their presence. The institute is honored. Its acquisition of his genius recalls what the great Poincaré wrote of the savant early in his career:

"Herr Einstein is one of the most original minds I have ever met. In spite of his youth he already occupies a very honorable position among the foremost savants of his time. What we marvel at in him, above all, is the ease with which he adjusts himself to new conceptions and draws all possible deductions from them. He does not cling tightly to classical principles but sees all conceivable possibilities when he is confronted with a physical problem. In his mind this becomes transformed into an anticipation of new phenomena that may some day be verified in actual experience. . . . The future will give more and more proofs of the merits of Herr Einstein, and the university that succeeds in attaching him to itself may be certain that it will derive honor from its connection with the young master."

As proof of the esteem for Professor and Mrs. Einstein of the people of my State, including the director and faculty of the institute and the president and faculty of the university housing it, one of the largest and most enthusiastic receptions of welcome ever known to New Jersey was recently tendered to him and his gentle, charming wife and companion. We love them both.

My own admiration for the great scientist, mathematician, and physicist, has existed for some time. My shortcomings in mathematics may account for it in part. I marveled at his mastery of problems that were never quite clear to me in their simpler forms. I saw him conquer not only those things beyond my comprehension but beheld him penetrate also far beyond the realms achieved by any scientist. His name is synonymous with relativity. I endeavored to follow the path he blazed in science but finally contented myself with the admiration his genius created and the joy of appreciation of his kind, simple nature and his humane liberty-loving character.

In his simplicity and modesty, he has written: "Everyone should be respected as an individual, but no one idolized. It is an irony of fate that I should have been showered with so much uncalled-for and unmerited admiration and esteem. Perhaps this adulation springs from the unfulfilled wish of the multitude to comprehend the few ideas which I, with my weak powers, have advanced."

Such as he, scientist, philosopher, humanitarian merits the high regard of any nation. Great Britain, France, Spain, and other countries have welcomed him and offered him their citizenship. Certainly the United States, which he has publicly declared to and does love—beacon of liberty that it is—gladly will extend to Dr. Einstein all the privileges and prerogatives of her citizenship.

I know that he loves the land of his birth, the German people and his Jewish race. In that he is like all true Americans, including Americans of foreign extraction, and the affection that he bears for his native soil does not lessen, but rather accentuates, the love that he has for this liberty-loving land of ours.

He is saddened, as are we, by the plight of the Jews in Germany; his Jewish traditions were inculcated in him at his mother's knee; his people are bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh, and he is proud of his race. As a result he is beloved and idolized by the Jewish people. But they are not alone. We all join with them in our admiration, love, and esteem for the great man amongst us. His coming to us has been a tribute to true civilization; so is it a telling rebuke to man's inhumanity to man.

Here minorities are protected and human rights safeguarded. Our Constitution, which Dr. Einstein so admires, by its provisions grants inalienable rights to minorities which may not be taken away. As long as it remains our basic law, which may God preserve to us, minorities along with the majorities shall enjoy the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness free from persecution and oppression. We are met in the United States, having come from all nations, to carry on and have our being according to the dictates of the individual, with conscience free from the restraint of oppression—political, religious, or otherwise. We believe that ours is the greatest nation on earth. The United States is, and ever will be, a true guardian of civilization. That protection we offer gladly to Dr. Einstein, thinker and doer, humanitarian and friend, permanently.

By so doing, we shall confer an unprecedented honor, not only upon the great scientist, but we shall pay tribute to the noble, God-respecting, law-abiding attributes of the Jewish people which he exemplifies.

Prompted by the genius of a great man, humanitarian, lover of the United States, and admirer of its Constitution—and inspired I might say—knowing as I did the sentiment of the citizens of New Jersey, which is symbolic of the feeling of the people of the United States, I, as a United States Representative from New Jersey offered in Congress the resolution with which you are now familiar for the purpose of admitting Dr. Einstein unconditionally to the character and privileges of a citizen of the United States.

Now, I know of no more worthy purpose than that which prompts this committee to confer here today. You have come from every section of the country in an effort to alleviate human suffering, to protect persecuted minorities, and defend human rights. I congratulate you upon the noble work you have undertaken. Human rights transcend all others. Your fight is not for the Jewish people, but for all humanity, for every liberty-loving man and woman of whatever race or creed. By your power and influence may you quickly succeed in putting an end to oppression and persecution wherever they may exist.

It is a distinguished honor to meet with you here and to be permitted to pay tribute to Dr. Einstein whom you and I with you love, and to help promote the triumph of true civilization so dear to his heart—and to ours—over the relic of the Dark Ages—sinister oppression. I sincerely thank you for this honor and privilege and heartily do I enlist in the cause you have undertaken in the name of humanity.

THE FRAZIER-LEMKE BILL

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House, last Wednesday evening, April 25, it was my privilege to preside over a meeting of representatives of farming, business, banking, and the professions, of the States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. The meeting, as I announced to the House on the same day, was held in the Caucus Room of the old House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

The delegates and representatives who attended this meeting came here solely in the interests of the Frazier-Lemke bill for the following reasons:

First. For an adequate volume of money to meet the normal money needs of the Nation.

Second. The bill completely destroys bankers' control and places it back where it lawfully belongs—with the Federal Government.

Third. It definitely stabilizes the value of farm land, improvements thereon, and adequately provides a method for the complete rehabilitation of all farmers and home owners who are being ruined by the millions under prevailing conditions.

Fourth. It provides for a legitimate and proper method of financing the money needs of the Federal Government.

Fifth. In fact, the application of this Frazier-Lemke principle of monetary reform will quickly prove that the American people will not need regimenting methods or some of the ridiculous palliatives that are now being employed.

Sixth. In stabilizing the value of property, it will revive the love for farms and homes among our American people on a scale never equaled heretofore and usher in an era of economic freedom, from which will naturally flow economic justice, and definitely establish the Jeffersonian principle of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none" and once more give the American people the measure of freedom to exercise their God-given talents relieved of the fear of ruination, misery, and want they are now so sorely afflicted with.

Resolutions embodying the text of the foregoing were adopted unanimously. In opening the meeting I made the following statement:

I would say to our distinguished Senators and Representatives from several States, and to these farmers from the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, and the representatives of the National Farmers' Union that this meeting tonight, in my humble opinion, is one that will largely determine the future course of American agriculture. I think it will determine or prove the soundness of what our good President said—I think it was yesterday—when he said that "the new deal is evolution rather than revolution."

Having been in this farm fight for the past 15 years, I believe in all candor and frankness that the farmers of the Corn Belt of this country, the farmers of the semiarid regions of the Northwest and the Southwest have reached that momentous epoch in their lives when the next year will determine whether or not they will go along with this country as they have in the past, as peaceful, law-abiding, wealth-creating, tax-paying citizens, by peaceful evolution, or whether they will find it necessary to accomplish their ends by riotous revolution.

I want to say to you men from Illinois and Indiana that 15 years ago I visited practically every big farmer in your States and sold them purebred hogs. I bought hogs of your purebred livestock growers, and now, after 15 years, we say that American agriculture today is at the lowest ebb in all of its history, reports to the contrary notwithstanding.

The word that we have received from Congress year after year has been if the farmers of this country will only unite on a common program, Congress will enact into law their program; and I say to you without fear of successful contradiction that the farmers of this country, with the possible exception of the cotton-growing South, have united on a common program, and that program is the passage of the Frazier-Lemke bill.

Now I am going to be brief. It is a great honor to preside over this meeting. Distinguished Senators and Congressmen, our only and our sole objective at the present moment is to secure enough additional signatures on the Frazier-Lemke petition to bring our bill to a vote on the floor of the House of Representatives. We are willing to abide by the consequences. We are willing to abide by the decision of the House of Representatives, and all we ask is fair treatment, to give our bill a chance to be voted on.

The officers of the National Farmers Union, Mr. E. H. Everson, of St. Charles, S.Dak., president; Mr. Edward B. Kennedy, of Kankakee, Ill., secretary; and Mrs. M. C. Puncke, of Kankakee, Ill., assistant secretary, were present and addressed the meeting.

Senator PATRICK McCARRAN addressed the delegates and pledged his unqualified support to the Frazier bill in the Senate. A number of Members of this House were present and were called upon for expressions of opinion, practically all of whom expressed approval of the bill. Some of these Members had signed the petition, some indicated that they would sign it. Most interesting of all, however, were the remarks of the actual farmers who were present and who expressed themselves most forcibly in support of the bill.

The consensus of opinion was that instead of doing something for agriculture, something had been done to agriculture, that instead of restoring the purchasing- and debt-paying power of the farmer, it had taken it away from him following the war. Coupon grabbers have been permitted to escape paying their part of the war, and the amount that they should have paid has been taken out of the agricultural wealth produced in this country. The National Farmers' Union unequivocally and vigorously supports the Frazier-Lemke bill. This bill has more support for it in Congress than any other agricultural bill pending. The legislatures of 26 States have endorsed it.

These men say the farmer wants a new deal, a real new deal—not just a bunch of "new dealers" who stack the cards and give the other fellow all the aces. These men refer to Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, and former Assistant Secretary, but now Under Secretary, Tugwell, as the dealers who stacked the cards against them. All the farmer wants is the opportunity to retain the title to his home.

These representatives of the farmers from the Corn Belt say that neither the Farm Credit Administrator nor the Agricultural Adjustment Administration will make it possible for farmers to retain the titles to their homes. The first thing is to make it possible for the farmer to be secure in his home, for the farmer's home is the dearest thing this side of Heaven to him. The farmer sets aside a little money for a rainy day and now finds it in a closed bank. We are supporting legislation that will release these deposits in closed banks, but it appears that we are not to have the chance of voting on this legislation even though we obtained 145 signatures to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill.

The farmer fights the elements. Now he must fight other elements that seek to deprive him of what little he has left.

One prominent official of the National Farmers' Union expressed the opinion that no Congressman or Senator should go home without giving the bill a chance to come out on the floor of the House and give it a free and fair chance to pass, for it will rescue the farm homes of America, and will be the salvation of this Nation, and a start in the right direction.

Someone asked the question, "How can Members of Congress who have farm constituents go back home after adjournment and answer the farmer who has lost or is losing his farm by the confiscation route of the money lender?" The answer was "that unless the bill passes, the farmers will answer next November. The time has come when the farmer will not be denied what he wants when longer he wants it."

The Frazier bill has been in the Senate for 2 years. It has had extensive hearings. People understand it, although they pretend to misunderstand it and disseminate false information and propaganda concerning its merits.

Mrs. Puncke, assistant secretary, National Farmers Union, a woman who is a farmer herself, who calls on farmers, who talks to the head of the family, and who understands the problem of the better half of the family, informed the assembly that every day in her work she sees many sad foreclosures and confiscations of farm property. She sees men and women down and out. She says that the Farm Credit Administration has saved some homes and postponed the day of reckoning, but it is not really saving our farmers or our homes. The farmers cannot pay the interest and the charges connected with the Farm Credit Act, and eventually the day of reckoning will come again.

She made it apparent that people who live here in Washington lose touch with conditions at home. They get away from the feeling of the thing—the terrible distress that is in the air, and she stoutly maintained that the Frazier bill is the one bill through which we do not have to pay tribute to the international bankers. It puts money in circulation so that farm prices will rise. It gives us money on which we pay a service charge to our National Government. The farmers are at the end of their rope. They have no equity on which to borrow more. The Government promised to see them through and to give them a chance to live. The Frazier-Lemke bill is the only bill that is going to save our independent farm homes.

The situation in the country is dangerous. There is a growing resentment against the deal which the farmers are getting that is some day going to flare up; and when it does, God help this country. We must have the Frazier bill, and we are going to get it.

Senator McCARRAN showed his perfect understanding of this farm butchery when he stated that while money is being poured by the billions into certain lines, we failed to give it to the lower strata of life where labor and toil live hourly. We fail to go into the ranks of the humble. That is what you are fighting for in this measure which you have before you, a measure that will pour money down to the grass roots, on the beginning of all life, whence it will work its way upward to the upper stratas and benefit them to the same degree that it benefits tillers of the soil.

The National Farmers Union is one of the most unselfish, loyal, and aggressive organizations in the country. These farmers have organized themselves. There is not a paid organizer in any State. This is one of the features that stands out above all else. Some Members of this House say that the petition should not be signed. The rule to discharge the committee from further consideration of a bill is just as much a creature of the House of Representatives as the committee to which the bill has been referred.

It has been contended by some that the liberal provisions of this bill would enable the owner of marginal land to sell it to the Government through the mortgage route. This is impossible, since the bill does not provide for the making of any new loans.

Still others have said that $3,000,000,000 will not be sufficient to pay off the total farm mortgage indebtedness. But the bill provides that the available surplus and net profit of the Federal Reserve banks shall be invested in 1½-percent mortgage bonds. This, together with the amortization payments of 1½ percent, could be used to purchase additional mortgage bonds. This would make available the necessary funds to refinance the existing mortgage debt as fast as it is possible to refinance and appraise and complete the loans.

And some ask, If we start doing this, where will we stop? It is not a question of where we will stop, but we have to start here. We must restore the income and purchasing power of the American farmer so that the laborer can be put into productive labor to serve the farmer. He can use $25,000,000,000 worth of the products of labor, such as harness, fences, paint, repairs, cloth, machinery, and the things that labor must produce in order to have a job.

Some members of the House who have signed the petition admitted that they had refused to sign until they were convinced that the bill was sound. There are those who are not in full accord with the bill, but they believe that something must be done for the farmers, and done now. They believe that the terrific situation which confronts the farmers in meeting their debts justifies the support of this bill, even though you are not in complete accord with all its provisions. The existing situation is much worse than anything which might be produced by the operation of the Frazier bill. Agriculture is on the rocks now. How much longer it can go on is the vital question. The farmer cannot pay the current high rate of interest and take the low level of prices for what he sells. We had best give the Frazier bill an opportunity to save the farmer rather than to bring about a chaotic condition by our present somewhat modified policy of laissez-faire.

One of the most pathetic and tragic stories ever heard came from the lips of Mr. F. J. Hendrichs, of Bowling Green, Ohio, a dirt farmer on one of the best 225-acre farms in our State, raising abundant crops of corn each year, raising hogs, feeding each winter 50 steers. Years ago, when he first acquired his farm, there were no good farms. In the wintertime the mud was belly-deep on the horses with which he had to travel to get to the county seat. The land was swampy, needed ditching and clearing. Now the land is tilled and drained in the most perfect manner possible. It is bounded by hard-surfaced modern roads, paid for by assessing the property owners, one of the worst injustices ever perpetrated upon the farmer.

Mr. Hendrichs 2 years ago bought his feeder cattle from Texas. He bought the best that was on the market. He would order cattle from some of the local dealers, make a nominal payment down when the order was filled, and would send a draft in advance when they were ready to ship. He was astounded to find that on one load of cattle that he bought, when he received the bill for it, he was to forward a draft to a banker in Wall Street, which indicates conclusively that the Wall Street pirates are covering the country pretty thoroughly when they are in the cattle business in the Southwest.

This gentleman has owned his farm all his life. It is one of the finest in the State. He could have sold it before the war for $150 an acre. Many times during the war period he could have sold it for much more, but he did not sell. He and his good wife had lived on it and worked the soil all their life. Their children had grown up. They didn't want the farm sold.

Following the war Mr. Hendrichs, as was the plight of practically all farmers, lost money each year through declining prices of his own products and because of the high cost of commodities he had to buy and high taxes. Much sickness came into the little family. His son had to go to the hospital. A little later Mr. Hendrichs, Sr., had to go to the hospital. He brought tears to the eyes of some of his listeners when he said that before leaving for the hospital he journeyed outside his home and longingly gazed over his little domain, his buildings and equipment, because he thought that might be the last time he would ever see them. Then his hard of cattle became infected with fever, and he had to sell them for next to nothing. He is now $13,000 in the red, so he had to put a mortgage on his farm and home. His good wife was most reluctant, for somehow she seemed to feel the sorrow and suffering which that mortgage might cause some day.

Mortgage is indeed a sinister word, taken from the French words, "mort" meaning death, and "gage" meaning hand—literally the hand of death that strangles to an economic death 2,000 farmers and home owners every time the sun rises and sets. But there was nothing else to do, so they mortgaged their farm for $10,000. They are now about to be foreclosed. They cannot get the necessary amount through the Farm Credit Administration; and unless the Frazier-Lemke bill is passed, it means old-age pensions, charity, or doles for this real knight of nature's nobility, 78 years old today, and still strong physically and mentally.

When these splendid tillers of the soil, these pioneers who blazed the trail, who cleared the wilderness and made them grow the waving fields of golden grain, when these patriarchs, these once independent sovereigns, now come before us and point to a threadbare and faded suit of clothes which they admit was bought 10 years ago, and that they have no money now with which to buy a new one, it is high time that this Congress open its eyes, that the Congress look down upon the grass roots and in the windows of the homes of the finest citizens in our land.

The Frazier bill is the only remedy. If you do not help us now, you cannot help many of us at all later on. We have no such wild hopes as immediate prosperity or becoming rich following the passage of the Frazier bill. We merely want an opportunity to break the strangling cord of the money lenders. We want to hold our farms for ourselves and our children and our children's children. We do not care for any more of the unfair treatment, the unsympathetic attitude, the discrimination, and the complete damned foolishness of the Farm Credit Administration.
